HAVING the House fast in his clutch with Crisp, Gorman, who had Presidential ambitions, would now step in to take the Senate organization from the Republicans so soon as ever the bars were down. That was a day which mightily promoted the impressiveness of the populist Peffer. Long, lean, with a beard like unto Aaron's and a Don Quixote face, Peffer theretofore had been granted little or no countenance by either Democrats or Republicans. Now both parties made a pet of him and were scrambling for his good will. He went finally with the Gorman folk.

It was about this time, too, that a gentleman of the press asked the celebrated Jerry Simpson what he had to say of his party's Senator from Kansas.

"It would do no good to print it," observed Jerry; "he's there until the end of his term, and he'll never come back. However, I don't share the common view of Peffer. Some say he's like a turkey with his lean neck and long legs; others insist—thinking perhaps more of his appetite than his looks—that he resembles a turkey-buzzard. But for myself, he reminds me of nothing so much as a sea-green wolverine."

Ike Hill, the Democratic "whip" of the House—on duty yet, is Hill—paid a special visit to the Senate to form his own personal estimate of Peffer. "He won't do," said Hill when he returned, his stony eye more than usually indurated, "he won't do. His head is built like a quail trap. No man with a head like that will ever rival Webster."

But whether Peffer should do those deeds or no to wrest the wreath from Webster, Gorman knew that he counted for reorganization to the extent of one vote, and Webster himself on that question could have counted for no more. Wherefore, Gorman, always plausible, ever specious, knowing men as sailors know a channel, brought Peffer over to his standards, and in the end tore the Senate from the Republicans with Peffer and his fellow-agrarians.

Lest one should drift to some impression of a mental insufficiency on Peffer's part, it were but justice to come to his rescue with a story. Peffer could say a good thing when the time was fair; and he did, too, although his want of fashion—for some men of the Senate are fashionable while others are not—would limit its circulation by the papers.

It was when Hatch's Anti-Option bill was before the Senate; a vote was being called. The legislatures of both Missouri and Kansas, with that boundless aplomb which is the frequent attribute of legislatures, had by resolutions instructed the Senators from those States to vote "Aye" for the measure. When Vest, himself a vehement "trader in futures," and interested in still nearer ways as a shareholder of the St. Louis Board of Trade, was called on to vote, he arose to a question of privilege. First reciting in mournful tones how the legislature had instructed him to vote "Aye," Vest then on outspread pinion began to soar with the occasion.

"But, Mr. President," cried Vest, "I have my oath and my duty under it as a Senator. I regard this measure as one pernicious in its purpose; it would be unconstitutional should it become a law. I am therefore bound by my oath to vote against it. The legislature of my State cannot instruct me to commit perjury. I will accept defeat, but I will not violate my oath. I say again, no legislature shall instruct me to commit perjury, and I vote 'No' against this bill."

Vest sat down with that air of sombre grandeur which should belong with one who accepts ostracism when it comes with honor and who, rather than be separated from his virtue, will take it with him into exile. It was highly dramatic.

But the situation was to receive a jolt. The saturnine Peffer, who had been absent on the first roll, was called squarely in the wake of Vest's oration. "Mr. President," said Peffer in his saw-filing voice, "the legislature of my State has instructed me to vote 'Aye' for this bill, and since my private interests do not make it perjury for me to do so I desire to be thus recorded."

There was a pause; Allison and other superheated Senators looked toward Vest to see if he would be upon some retort; but the Missourian held stolidly to his chair, and the next moment the Senate swung again into the channel and forged ahead with its affairs.

The Princess Romanova

The Strange Dance that Fortune Led a Boston Cotillon Leader on the Plains of Siberia

BY GEORGE HORTON

—AND EVERY DAY HE LOOKED AT IT

PERHAPS it all happened because she was fair and vivacious and he dark and of a serious turn. At any rate, he had succeeded in creating a sensation among the fashionable Boston set among which he moved until he lost his money. Mrs. "Tom" Ghoram, whose protégé he was, says it reads like a story out of the Arabian Nights; and yet she was the first one of his old friends to give entire credence to the cabled account of the affair. For, as the reader will remember, the mere statement of the principal fact aroused international interest. But we must not anticipate; the details, which have never been told, are as follows:

It began on the deck of an Amur River steamer, bound from Vlagoveshensk for Stretinsk; a stern-wheeler, drawing three feet and a half of water. They had stopped to take on wood for the boilers for the third time that day, the men bringing it, two and two, upon long bars down the steep bank and across the springy plank to the deck. The task completed, the whistle blew loudly to summon the passengers wandering about on the shore, some of them half a mile or so away. They all came, eagerly running, their hands filled with bouquets of the glorious flowers for which Siberia is famed: wild peonies, tiger lilies, and tall lilies of a blood-red hue, great, fragrant roses, wild lilac, priceless orchids of many varieties. The Princess came last, walking leisurely, carrying three long tiger lilies in her hand. The sight of her, and especially her air of imperious nonchalance, in view of the fact that she was keeping the boat waiting, aroused Courtland Hopper from his train of gloomy reflections as he stood there leaning against the rail and looking down from the high deck. The sailors stood ready to pull the plank aboard, the passengers were grumbling in all languages, seemingly, save English, and the fiery little captain, there on the bridge, was biting his nether lip and clenching his fists, but did not say a word. This was an imperial mail steamer and he had his position of the Government; he would have been foolish indeed to affront Romanova, one of the richest heiresses in Russia, and member of a most influential family.

"By Jove, she's a thoroughbred, and a beauty, too!" mused Courtland Hopper, looking at her with sudden interest. She was tall, slender and exquisitely graceful, with a languid movement that somehow suggested cultured restraint. A Russian of the purest type, her complexion was marvelous, and her hair the color of ripe wheat. Her eyes were a laughing blue and her features, though noble, yet were of that Slav type by virtue of which the Russian peasant claims kin with his Czar. She was attired in a traveling costume of light blue and a hat of expensive straw, daintily trimmed with corn-flowers—a Paris confection, by the way—one of those simple, effective creations of which no male man knoweth the price, whether it be seventy-five cents or seventy-five dollars. Over her left shoulder she twirled carelessly a parasol of brilliant hue, imported from Yokohama.

Directly ahead of the Princess puffed frantically a little, fat old woman in black, the chaperon of a German opera singer on her way to Moscow. The little old woman stepped upon the plank and teetered timidly up its precarious incline, a comical figure, antiquely coquettish. The Princess stopped about two feet from the shore end, and, smiling demurely, danced upon tiptoe, balancing herself by means of the gaudy parasol and the long tiger lilies. The result, if one could overlook its slight suggestion of cruelty, was highly satisfactory from a comedy standpoint, as the audience upon the boat enthusiastically testified. The fat, little old lady did not fall off the plank, but her efforts to stay on, and the upward speed which she made despite those efforts, were grotesque in the extreme. She suggested one of those semi-aquatic birds that cannot fly, but yet attain great speed upon land by flapping rudimentary wings. Nor was her voluble indignation, expressed in fluent German and bad Russian when she at last stepped upon the hot metal deck, less diverting. The Romanova flashed one merry glance—a fleeting vision of white teeth and mischievous blue eyes—at her audience and then came fearlessly up the plank, again the graceful and haughty aristocrat.

Hopper had noticed, as no one who travels in Russia can fail to notice, the general high spirits and kittenish gayety of the women, but he had not been prepared for this mischievous outbreak on the part of the Princess. It gave him something to think about besides his own homesickness and general disgust, and lighted a faint hope in his bosom; perhaps, after all, life among these people would not be unendurable. For Frederick Courtland Hopper, of the Courtland-Hoppers, one time cotillon leader and popular club man, had come to Siberia to stay. How he lost his money is no concern of ours here. It's always easy enough to lose money, and there's nothing harder than to get it back. He simply had to begin again, and as he was trained for no profession it would be necessary for him to begin at the bottom. Now, all work is honorable, of course, but it's not pleasant for an ex-cotillon leader and clubman to sell ribbons over a counter or keep books. There was a girl in the question, too, who married another soon after Hopper lost his money. About this time old Franklin Emerson, of the Russian-American Trading Company, came to Boston, a millionaire who had made his money along the Amur, and several of the papers contained interviews with him and accounts of his romantic career. Hopper went to see him. The young man wanted to get as far away as possible and Siberia appealed to him in the matter of distance. He found Mr. Emerson enthusiastic.

"Teeming with opportunities!" he cried. "A great, splendid empire, just opened up. Vast wealth to be had for the taking—princely domains of land, treasures of mineral wealth, lumber, mercantile chances. Any young man is a fool who doesn't go there and go now. It's a new America, waiting to be occupied, but now's the time to go. French, Germans, English are pouring in, and every year diminishes a man's chances of getting in on the ground floor."

Emerson took a liking to young Hopper and the latter went out to Siberia to take a position in the company's new store at Stretinsk. As there were friends in the West to whom he wished to say good-by, he journeyed to Siberia by way of the Pacific Ocean, Japan, Vladivostok, the Amur. And so it happened that he stood to-day on the deck of a little steamer, unhappy, yet bravely determined to make the best of life, watching one of the greatest heiresses in all Russia play a childish prank. The Romanova occupied two of the luxurious cabins in the forward part of the boat, one for herself and one for her maid. There were only six of these cabins, and the Military Governor of Irkutsk occupied three of them, himself in one, his trunks in another, and his Great Dane dog with its attendant in a third. The main body of the passengers, without reference to wealth or social position, were crowded together upon an upper deck beneath an awning. There they preempted places to lay down their blankets and slept at night as neatly packed as sardines, or sat about all day rolling cigarettes, playing cards and gossiping in twenty different languages. It was a dappled, conglomerate scene, a medley of strange costumes, bright handkerchiefs tied about feminine heads, long boots, blouses, ribbons of Little Russia, Tartars, Bouriaks, Germans, French, moujiks, Jews—and one American. From the rafters of the awning hung a most extraordinary assortment of personal belongings: cavalry sabres, loaves of black bread, bundles of Chinese arrows from Aigun, boots, bottles, tiny samovars, hams, half-eaten fish, and a few feminine hats resplendent with cheap, gaudy flowers. Every inch, available and unavailable, on roof and floor had been seized. F. Courtland Hopper, ex-cotillon leader, occupied a space two feet wide and six long, between a florid-faced and cheerful German and a Bouriak cavalryman. The German could speak a little comical English. He was returning to Amsterdam from Port Arthur, whither he had taken out a dredger for a Dutch company. He knew one Russian word, "peevo"—beer, and he descended frequently to the bar on the deck below and yelled "Peevo! Peevo!" so loudly that he could be heard all over the ship. The Bouriak, who resembled a cross between a Chinaman and a North American Indian, sat patiently for twenty hours on a stretch looking at the tips of his long cavalry boots. He was returning from a scene of carnage on the Chinese frontier, enough of which had leaked out to horrify the entire civilized world, despite the Russian censorship, and was on his way to receive further orders from the White Czar. While sleeping, Hopper turned his face toward the German.

Among the other passengers were a tea merchant, who had a cargo from China in the hold, which he was moving across the vast continent, for shipment to England; an opera troupe from Vladivostok—pretty Viennese girls for the most part; exiles whose terms were expired; Europeans looking for mines; noisy students on their way to Holy Moscow. From Julius Smulders, the German engineer, Hopper learned who Romanova was, and that the rest of her name was Anna Michaelovna. Smulders obtained this information from one of the Viennese singers, who had learned Russian in Vladivostok. These two talked together for hours, and even sang duets. The girl was coquettish and nearly drove Smulders to desperation, causing him to sigh deeply and exclaim, "I love her very heavy, but she will not much, so what can I do? So I think I drink a little." Whereat he would wade through a sea of heads, plunge down to the bar below and shout "Peevo!"

The incident of the plank and the fat old lady so interested Hopper that he devoted much of his time to watching for the Romanova to appear on the little first-class deck forward, where she walked up and down, attired in cool, bewitching costumes, or talked with the General.

"She would have been in my set a year ago," reflected Hopper. "She seems to have the exact carriage of a chic, up-to-date American girl."

The fact that he was traveling third class made him feel like an emigrant, immeasurably separated from the fair creature over there with the gods. He was in no mood to reflect that the question of funds had not entered into his choice of a third-class passage; that the first-class places on the Government steamers are only obtained by influence, and that one must sometimes wait for weeks to get accommodation. Here he was among the Bouriaks and moujiks, and there was she, the sort of woman he was accustomed to, separated from him by a great gulf.

And patiently the steamer forged ahead through vast stretches of virgin solitude, unutterably lonely; past interminable forests. After many hours they would come to a Cossack village, perched on a bluff, a few square log houses with white window-frames. But this was always on the Siberian side, on the right. On the Manchurian bank there was no sign of human habitation or life, for the dread Russian bear stood growling just across the swift, yellow river and the Chinese had taken their families and vanished. From time to time log rafts drifted past, carrying emigrants with their families, their horses and cattle to the lands in this vast solitude, promised them by their Father, the Czar. Sad, wondering women sat in the doors of the tiny huts built upon the logs, with their children clambering about their knees, while the men stood at the corners with huge paddles guiding the clumsy craft. The cattle loomed large and monstrous in the uncertain light of the evening or the early dawn, as though they were standing upon the surface of the water itself.

Hopper was saddened by the sight of these people, going they knew not where nor to what—going down stream with no hope of ever coming back up. He felt that he, too, was an emigrant.

It was through his skill with the revolver that Courtland Hopper first attracted the attention of the fair Romanova. The steamer had stopped at the foot of a bluff to take on wood, and the passengers learned that there would be a delay of about three hours. Hopper and Smulders went for a long walk in the woods and on their return heard the sound of shooting. Emerging into the open near the shore they beheld the Russian General shooting at a bottle on a stump, at a distance of about twenty paces. He fired five times and missed, much to the amusement of the Princess, who stood near. In fact, her derisive laughter so irritated the pompous General that he threw the weapon spitefully on the ground and began to explain volubly to his fair tormentor.

"What does he say?" asked the German of the opera singer, who was also one of the spectators, and a moment later he explained to Hopper:

"He says it's an American pistol from Vladivostok, and that it's no good."

Courtland Hopper picked up the weapon and examined it. It was not an expensive model, but a practical arm, of honest blue steel. He tossed it familiarly in his hand and then said to Smulders: "Will you ask our fair interpreter here to present my compliments to the General, and tell him that I am an American and beg the privilege of proving the excellence of this American weapon?"

As the Viennese addressed the General, Hopper lifted his hat gracefully. The Princess clapped her little hands, nodded pleasantly at the American and cried, "Bravo! Bravo!" It was she, evidently, who persuaded the General to reload the weapon and accede to the request.

Now, as usual, there was a group of peasant women standing about, who had come down to the boat, from the Lord knows where, to sell milk. Hopper tossed fifty kopeks upon the earth, and picking up five bottles walked to a log near the stump, where he set them in a row. Then he returned to the group standing about the General and commenced firing. The distance was in reality not great nor the feat difficult for so good a shot. The effect, however, was spectacular, for between the rapid "cracks" of the weapon could be heard the "ching, ching, ching" of the breaking bottles.

Hopper offered the revolver to the General with a polite salute, but the latter generously complimented his marksmanship and begged that he would keep it, adding to the gift the box of cartridges which he produced from a coat pocket. The American was somewhat embarrassed. His pride was averse to the acceptance of the gift, yet he was unable to explain that he meant no offense. He stood offering the pistol to the Russian, while the latter pressed the cartridges upon him. The Princess relieved the situation by taking the cartridges and handing them to Hopper with a beseeching little moue. He accepted with a courtly bow, as graceful as though he were saluting a cotillon partner. The Princess responded in kind and walked away on the arm of the Military Governor. The whistle shrieked and they were off again, purring up the broad river. Occasionally a wild duck would arise ahead of them and whiz away, or a goose with long, inquiring neck, writhing to right and left like a snake. Once a huge bear lumbered down upon a spit of sand and looked at them, clumsily curious. The two men, on either side of the prow, sounding by means of stakes attached to ropes, swayed rhythmically as they cast their wooden spears, chanting the depths: "Chetyre, chetyre-polovena, pyat!" (Four, four and a half, five!) As often as a down-coming steamer passed, the little captain made a trumpet of his hands and shouted, "How much water is there in the Shilka?"

The disquieting rumor that the water was rapidly falling was gaining confirmation by each report. Once the men with the poles cried "Tres-polovena" (three and a half) and the steamer scraped on the bottom. At Pokrovka, a dreary Cossack village near the junction of the Amur and Shilka rivers, they found a smaller mail boat awaiting them that drew but three feet of water. They changed over with a multilingual hullabaloo and a grand scramble for places—all save the Governor, the Princess and the opera singer, who moved leisurely into the first-class cabins like the superior beings that they were. Hopper still clung to Smulders as the most promising material for one wall of his sleeping apartment. For the other, by the way, he could do no better now than to secure the smokestack. They got off at noon and were immediately attacked by an immense drove of flies of the size of small bumblebees and having two fierce projecting tusks, plainly visible. For several hours now Hopper forgot the Princess and even his homesickness. Life contained no possible interest save the repelling of these enthusiastic boarders, as the slightest relaxation of vigilance meant a sharp pain and a nasty sore. At night, however, when the great Siberian moon was shining brightly upon the long silver ribbon of water and the dim, untenanted solitudes, and the faithful engine was breathing softly, like a huge behemoth swimming up the stream, he wondered if she could dance, and if a merchant in Russia had any social standing. Then he would sigh at the reflection that in any case after Stretinsk he should never see her again. The next day they stuck fast on a sand-bank, and a boat's crew carried the anchor far up the river and dropped it, attached to a stout hawser. Then, by means of the windlass, they deliberately warped the steamer loose. At dark of the same day they grounded for good in two and a half feet of water, a few yards below a great tramp steamer firmly imbedded athwart the channel. There was no hope of going either up or down for many days to come. The peasants took the matter philosophically: they would simply live where they were, rent free, buying their bread and milk of the Cossacks. When God saw fit to send water they would go on.

But what would the General do, the Governor of Irkutsk? For, as everybody knew, he must be at his post on a certain date, and the White Czar would not be apt to take the will of God into account. Within two days the General's intentions were made manifest, for his orderly arrived with several long dugouts, each having a mast at the prow. A long rope, fastened at the stern, was passed through a pulley at the top of the mast and the other end attached to a shaggy horse. The Governor's baggage was piled into one of these dugouts and he seated himself comfortably in the midst. A moujik with a paddle occupied the stern, another mounted the horse and they were off, the animal scrambling over the stones by the shore or splashing through the shallow water, while the man with the paddle kept the boat clear of the bank. This is the ancient mode of ascending Russian rivers, the method of "loshat and lotka," and two military stations or about thirty miles can thus be made under favorable circumstances, by getting under way at four o'clock in the morning.

To Hopper's consternation the Princess and her maid followed in a second dugout. But there were two more waiting on the bank, their owners hoping that others of the passengers would wish to avail themselves of their use.

"Come on," cried Hopper to Smulders. "Let's follow them. It will be a lark."

"A lark? What's that?"

"A lark? Why, fun, sport."

But Smulders sighed and shook his head, thinking of the fair Viennese. "Ah no," he said, "I care not if it be an eagle. I cannot leaf Chulia. I loaf her too heavy."

Hopper lost no time. By signs he conveyed to one of the sailors that he wished his luggage carried ashore and piled into a dugout. Soon he, too, was seated in the bottom, reclining gracefully against his impedimenta, his horse scrambling along in the wake of the Princess' lotka. It was an exhilarating method of travel, combining novelty with an element of danger productive of excitement. No one tipped over, it is true, but the American considered it a marvel that these narrow pig-troughs with their towering piles of baggage should remain upright for a moment. The voluble wrangle that went on, moreover, between the two moujiks at the extreme ends of the tow-line, and the gurgling of the current rushing past at the rate of six miles an hour, contributed liveliness and even an impression of speed. Sometimes, when the water was shallow, the horses waded a quarter of a mile from shore, with a wide expanse of yellow river on either hand; and if they came to a deep place the little animals plunged boldly in, swimming silently, with nothing but their heads and half of the postilions' bodies above water.

They made but one military station the first day, a large square building, where a samovar is kept always ready for travelers and the sledges that carry the mails over the ice in winter. The old General and the Princess were extremely courteous to Hopper and made him understand by signs that he was welcome. The General's orderly foraged and produced some black bread, some milk and a quantity of delicious fresh caviare of the kind the Russians do not export.

The Princess presided charmingly at the samovar, after which she disappeared for the night. Hopper spread his blankets upon the floor and was soon fast asleep. But he seemed no sooner to have closed his eyes than he was awakened again by the voice of the General shouting at him in Russian. It was only three o'clock, but the place was all a-bustle with preparations for departure Ere the mists had risen from the river they were again under way, dim as ghosts. Hopper reclined against his luggage and slept deliciously until the sun arose, when he was awakened by the stinging of a cloud of gnats. Sitting upright, he noticed that the lotka of the Princess was deserted by its fair passengers. Casting his eyes about, he observed maid and mistress strolling along the Government road that follows the course of the Shilka and that serves itself as the channel for a stream of Cossacks that are being poured into Manchuria. The bank was high at this point and the women were above him, plainly visible in the bright sun. The Romanova, twirling her Japanese parasol upon her shoulder, walked rapidly and with a joyous freedom of motion that testified to her love of the open air.

"I wonder if she plays golf?" mused Hopper, and at that very moment he perceived that he, too, was cramped, sitting there in the boat. He got out, accordingly, and struck out vigorously across a wide stretch of sand deposited during high water. He was some fifteen minutes climbing the steep bank and when he at last reached the road the Princess was nowhere to be seen. Indeed, the road at this point turned sharply away from the river and disappeared around the foot of a hill. Hopper knew, however, that it must wind back to the river, and he therefore followed the wide, dusty trail confidently, although it seemed to plunge into the heart of the wilderness. Once or twice he asked himself why he was walking so rapidly, and each time made answer: "Why, to keep up with my lotka, of course." He was too thorough a gentleman to admit to himself that he was pursuing the Princess; he would not have done such a thing on Beacon Street; why should he do it on a Government road in Siberia? At any rate, it would be an indiscreet thing to do, as she would be sure to crush him for his presumption. But he certainly had just as good a right to get out and walk as she. As he was soliloquizing thus and had about come to the conclusion that he was in a fair way of making an ass of himself, he thought he heard a shrill scream in the distance. Listening, with his heart in his mouth, he was sure, for the first cry was followed by others—wild, despairing shrieks, as of a woman in the most excruciating fear.

"Coming! Coming!" shouted Hopper, and feeling in his pocket for the General's American pistol, which, thank God! was there, he ran as he never ran before. Rounding a little turn in the road and a clump of trees he came suddenly upon a sight which thrilled him with rage and sickened him with fear—not for himself, but for the Princess. There she was, struggling in the arms of a big Chinaman, one of those tall, fierce creatures who inhabit the wild regions of Manchuria. The beast had lifted her in his arms and was running toward the woods with her, while another carried the maid. Two other Mongolians, with long war bows in their hands, completed the strange picture. Hopper shouted again, and the four Chinamen wheeled about and regarded him at first with startled malignancy that turned on the instant to amusement. Those four great brutes beheld one rather small, dark man, of dapper appearance despite his week's river travel—a

THE SONG THAT SOLD

By Charles Battell Loomis

Author of A Man of Putty, Etc.

THE STRANGE PARTNERSHIP OF THE SEVENTH-FLOOR-BACK TONE HITTER AND THE ADVERTISING MAN WHO WAS THE WHOLE THING

IT WAS on the return trip from the T. M. A. dinner at Syracuse that a demand for a story was made on Tom Chandler. Why it is that when grown men are traveling together and want to have a good time they turn to story telling I do not know, unless it is to prove that at heart they are nothing but children. But that really doesn't need proof, because we all know that the biggest kid at a game of baseball is the old gentleman with the close-clipped siders who howls his head off with delight at a three-bagger. Despite our average solemnity we Americans are children, and children of a pretty decent sort, too, which naturally brings us back to that big child and thorough-going good fellow, Tom Chandler.

After ministering to the necessities of the crowd that sat around him in the easy wicker chairs and assuring Isaac, the ebon-headed darky, that nothing more was needed of him, Tom made himself comfortable in the swiftly but smoothly moving car and struck a few preliminary chords on his organ of speech.

"I don't know anything you haven't heard—unless it's about myself," said he.

The actor looked as if he would like to deliver a discourse on the same topic, but he said nothing, being a man with a strong grip on himself—"reserve force" the critics call it—and Tom plunged into his story without further delay.

"I believe most of you know," said he, "that I began as errand boy in the office of which I am now the Whole Thing and most of my money has been made in advertising, but I once took a flyer in music that—well I might as well tell you all about it, because it goes to show that once in a while a Happy Fluke will net a man more of the Needful than months of Honest Toil, and it also shows that Little Tommy knew too much to follow the Will-o'-the-Wisp any farther after he had succeeded in grabbing the gold off her wings.

"About five years ago, when I first began really to realize that there was big money in the advertising business, there was a poor little chap who lived in the same apartment house that sheltered me. I used to meet him climbing up to his room near the clothes-lines, and he had such a sad face that he interested me and I struck up an acquaintance with him. He was an Artist with a capital A and no mistake—wedded to his Art and pledged against divorce, as my friend George Ade would say. Now, I'm not an authority on music, but that little chap could certainly knock some very fetching tones out of that rattletrap piano of his, and when he was playing you forgot that it only cost him about two dollars per month in the way of rent. Upon my word, if you had shut your eyes you would have imagined that it was that Alma-Tadema piano that Henry Marquand paid $60,000 for.

"It was a rattlebox, all right, for whenever I tried to knock harmony out of it chaos resulted, and I used to think it wasn't worth thirty cents. Possibly it was I who made it look like thirty cents, for I am not a Beethoven a single day in the week.

"The melancholy-eyed musician was not only a pianist but a composer as well, and, as near as I can make out, he believed that he was in the same line as some of the old Harmony Kings who ruled in Europe in the last century, and I am dead sure that as far as externals went he was leading the same kind of life they led. He was up against it morning, noon and night except when he was composing, and then I really believe he was in a suburb of Heaven—just about six miles out and going in as soon as the drawbridge closed.

"He told me that there were four or five musicians in town who believed in him, and who knew that after the sod was nicely knitted over him people would be getting gay with his music, but that for the present every publisher turned down his music so quick that he had given up showing it at all, and just went on composing to keep himself from being miserable.

"Once or twice I staked him to a dinner because he seemed lonesome eating by himself, and anyway, bread isn't half so interesting as a table d'hôte dinner with music. However, I want to say that after the first table d'hôte with music my sad-eyed friend suggested that if there was to be a repetition of the festive affair I cut out the music, as it gave him the Willies to hear it.

"Of course you understand that the languages I am using are my own and not the composer's. He could understand me all right because he came of Proper Americans in the vicinity of Hartford, and in his boyhood—before he became engaged to Music—he had indulged in slang, but now, the boy—he wasn't over twenty-five—was generally too miserable to use anything but the best English and he left the slang to me. But he was on to my curves all right and had a kind of humanness about him that made me sorrier than ever for him. Some of these musicians are dead to the world and to everything but themselves and music, but this chap would laugh when I read him a bit out of Dooley, and I understand he had Stevenson by heart, and he knew good architecture from bad, and used to tell me that some day people would wake up and find that we have buildings right here in New York that would have made a Greek happy for a fortnight.

"One day I took one of little Seventh-Floor-Back's compositions to a musician who is way up in G and I handed it to him to play, telling him that it was a song that my grandmother used to sing when she first landed from Warsaw in 1802, and that I thought it was rubbish, but that maybe he'd like it because it was so old.

"Well, that musician—he was a real lover of music and not a professional critic at all—he played that thing over and over and over, and he said that it might have been composed by a modern of the moderns, that Richard Strauss would have been glad to father it."

"Don't you mean Johann Strauss?" said the actor with a wise look.

"No, I don't. I asked him that, and he looked at me kind of tired with a Went-Away-Willy look and said, 'Tom, Richard Strauss is the chief apostle of the music of the future,' and then he said that he didn't believe it possible that my grandmother could ever have sung this in 1802.

"So then I told him that, come to think of it, my grandmother wasn't born until 1830 and that she didn't know Old Dan Tucker from Marching Through Georgia, and that this music was by a little starving American composer with a face that would make Russell Sage burst out crying, and a knack with a piano that would make a concert grand out of a melodeon.

"Well, his enthusiasm cooled somewhat, but he still said that it was a very notable piece of music, and that if the young man kept at it long enough he might do something very much worth while, and that if it had really been by Richard Strauss he should be glad to play it in public, but that no one would stand for it as the work of a man living between Third and Fourth Avenues, Borough of Manhattan."

"Hadn't the courage of his convictions, eh?" said the cartoonist, who was the only free silver man in his particular suburb and was proud of his backbone.

"No; few people have," said Tom, flicking the ashes of his cigar all over the waistcoat of the man on his right and then apologizing for it.

"Well, now, I've got to side-track the Dope-Eyed Musician and talk about myself again, and that's always a pleasant task. One day I took it into my head that I could compose a song myself because it seemed to come so easy to my friend. I have a pretty good ear and I can pick out a tune on the piano with any one finger of either hand, including both thumbs, and I found a piece of verse with a catchy line in it and just picked out a tune to it. As soon as I had got it so that I could play it the same three times running I went up six flights and knocked at the door of the composer's room. As good luck would have it he had just finished a piano composition or I might have knocked until I had fox bites on all my knuckles and never got a response. But having got rid of his idea he was lying down on the haircloth-granite sofa that took the place of three chairs and a bed, and when I knocked he said 'Come in.'

"He looked as pale as a ghost and as hungry as a rat, and I found out that he had been at work on his composition for ten hours straight away, and, when you realize that he knew that not a publisher in New York City would touch it and that it was all done to the Glory of God, as my old mother used to say, you'll believe that I felt the little Tone Hitter was something of a hero. And I also thought some thinks about the publishers that would have taken up all the dashes in the font to express.

"But quick, before the wonderful air could escape me, I went to the piano and I said, 'Say, Theodore, you're not the only Beethoven on the block and I want you to hear me make Chopin look like thirty cents.'

"Theodore was always a good-natured chap. (By the way, he was named Theodore Thomas after the orchestra leader; his mother had been a great admirer of Thomas when he had an orchestra in New York and so she saddled his name on her first-born, and was tickled to death when he decided to starve by music.) Well, as I say, he was a good-natured chap, and he actually sat still and let me play my abomination on the piano, and when it was finished he said, with a sort of second-hand smile, 'That is different from both Chopin and Beethoven. It wouldn't have entered their heads to do that.'

"And I told him that I knew that was no bouquet from the way it was put up, but if he would set the notes down on paper and then harmonize them so that a no-handed deaf and blind man could play them on sight I'd give him ten dollars.

"Say, boys, it was honest pathetic to see the way his eyes widened when he heard the words Ten Dollars. Gee, the poor chap hadn't supposed there was that much left in the world. In a twinkling he had pushed me from the piano and had played my tune all through without making a mistake, and when he'd finished I said to myself, 'You're all right, Tom Chandler. Maurice Grau will want you to write an opera for the De Reszkes and Madame Sembrich before the winter is over, and you'll have Harry B. Smith begging your music in his four hundred and fifty-fifth libretto. Oh, I tell you I felt like a conservatory, I was throwing so many bouquets at myself. And it was all in his touch, you see.

"Of course I had a scheme in my head. I wasn't really such a loo-loo as to suppose that I was marching ahead of Mendelssohn, Wagner and Reginald De Koven, the sidewalks lined with the populace, and plutocrats in the Waldorf-Astoria waving thousand-dollar bills and crying 'Hurrah for Tom Chandler, the World's Greatest Composer.' I was simply an advertising man with a scheme. I believe that you can place anything from a Uneeda firecracker to a fake actor if you advertise enough. I asked Theodore about how many days it would take him to harmonize my immortal work, and he gave me another of his shopworn smiles, and taking out a pencil and paper he began work at once. Talk about musicians being unbusinesslike! I never saw a man who attended to business like him. Why, the whistle blew six while he was at work, but he never turned a hair, but kept right on, and inside of half an hour he had produced the entire line of goods and spread them out on the keyboard for me. Oh, Motherdearjerusalem, that tune of mine was glorified! It was as if you picked up a bit of dirty, mouse-colored cloud and allowed the escaping sun to saturate it with its rays for a few seconds until it was turned into a rainbow-colored palace. I could hear Wagner splashing over the River Styx on his way to tell me that the Chandler-Theodore combine was the best ever, and that if we wouldn't mind taking Tristan and Isolde and not doing a thing to it he would return late that afternoon perfectly happy.

—"AND I SAID, 'SAY, THEODORE, YOU'RE NOT THE ONLY BEETHOVEN ON THE BLOCK'"

"As soon as the thing was on paper I handed Theodore a ten-dollar bill and then I blew him off to a dinner without music. He gave me the address of a music copyist to whom I took the music and the verses and asked him to make me a fair copy.

"He was an old, long-haired German on Second Avenue, with a collar that he had begun to wear when Wilhelm moved into that Berlin residence of his, and he had never taken it off out of respect to the Emperor—but he knew good music, all right.

"'Dot iss de vairst tüne I effer heered, but you haf harmoniced it noply,' he said.

"The next day I took the music down to Sternmeyer & Meyerstern, the eminent publishers of coon songs.

"There was a long line of people waiting to get their songs published, and at every desk in the establishment there sat a broad-jawed tough. I am not much of a beef cooler—one can't afford to be in my business—and so I passed beyond some of those who had been waiting since early morning for an interview, and I beckoned with authority to one of the toughs. He came up, rolling his head from side to side with a 'wotderhell' swagger, and I said, 'I'm a very busy man and I want this piece of music tried by your pianist as soon as possible.'

"You see, I knew a little about their ways of doing things, as I helped advertise 'Baby Pulled the Cat to Pieces.'

"'Come in ter-morrer,' said the tough, reaching out for the manuscript.

"'Not on your immortal Sarony,' said I, pulling the music out of his reach. 'In my business there is no such day as ter-morrer.' Then, to prevent delay, I showed him my card and it fetched him. Even a publisher of coon songs had heard of my firm, and he said to a younger tough, not over ten, 'Petey, take dis gent's card into Mr. Meyerstern an' see dat he gits it, see?'

"In not more than a minute Mr. Meyerstern came out and bowed oilily to me and I returned the bow as quick as I could. I told him straight from the shoulder what was the matter with me and that I was an advertising man who was prepared to coöperate with him in the floating of a song. 'Never mind who wrote it,' I said, 'but let's have your Paderewski entice it from the piano!'

"The only way to get along with these men is to meet them on their own ground. I saw that I had made a hit with him from the way that he kept repeating 'Entice it from the piano.'

"We went into a little room partitioned off from the private office of the firm and containing two or three chairs, an upright piano and portraits of celebrated people that you never heard of unless you are interested in coon songs. A short-haired young man in a loud suit was playing the raggedest rag-time march I ever heard. He played as well as a mechanical piano, and no matter where he lands he'll be able to earn a living as long as he has those accurate fingers and the muscles in his arms and his sense of rhythm. Rapidity and muscle and a correct ear spell a good salary to any man who is tough enough to take with the patrons of the Coney Island resorts, and this young man was tough enough.

"He played my tune through without a mistake, but it did not sound as good as when Theodore had played. Meyerstern kept his head swinging to it, and when the young man had finished he called in Sternmeyer, saying, 'Otto, this is for us, sure.'

"The young man at the piano said, 'Der tune's catchy, all right, but der harmony's all wrong.' A conflict of authorities. The German copyist had thought the harmony all right, but the air needed ventilating in his opinion. Well, I wasn't unduly elated, as I really hadn't much opinion of the ivory thumper's taste, and I stood ready to back my little composer as against myself every day in the week.

"We soon came to terms, and as I am something of a hustler I had them get that song on the market before the end of

CHAPTER IV

CRANE went back to his rooms, wrote his letter to Governor Sanders and awaited developments.

Nothing happened for more than a week concerning the Senatorship. Meanwhile, he gave up his expensive rooms, and with the assistance of a note broker managed to borrow enough money from Peter to pay Paul and to relieve himself from present obligations to one of the gentlemen who had so urgently invited him to commit political hari-kari. He secured quiet quarters in one of the suburbs of Washington, and found that he was quite as comfortable as he had been at his high-priced hotel at about one-fourth the cost.

The May days that followed were cool and bright and soft, as May days in Washington often are. The called session of Congress and the necessary presence of so many officials and diplomats made the gay town gayer than usual. The whole country was in a mood of exhilaration and self-gratulation which was vividly reflected at Washington. There could be no doubt that Crane's success was real and substantial.

Crane hugged himself with satisfaction when he reflected on his escape from being interned in the Senate, forced to remain quiescent during the time that he should have been most active, and finally enter the Senatorial contest, two years ahead, with a reputation which would probably have dwindled as rapidly as it had developed. Instead of that he was in the centre of movement and interest, and even if he could not make a serious effort before the Legislature in January he was in a good strategic position for the Senatorial election two years in advance—in the event that a dark horse should be chosen to succeed Senator Bicknell—and a great deal may happen in two years.

The Secretary of State, however, was disappointed in Crane. He proved to be quite as intractable as Thorndyke had been, and with less excuse—for Thorndyke had never been asked to little dinners at the Secretary's house. The Secretary's widowed daughter, Mrs. Hill-Smith, murmured once or twice when Crane was under discussion that he was "so very Western," and assumed a rather apologetic tone for having been seen at the play with him.

"I NEVER SAW A BETTER DINNER MAN THAN HUDGINS"

Crane, like everybody else, had really forgotten the Secretary in the press of affairs. He was amazed at not receiving an answer to his letter to Governor Sanders, and so told Thorndyke one night a few days after their meeting at Constance Maitland's house. Crane had a great esteem for Thorndyke's sincerity, which was justified, and Thorndyke in his heart was forced to admire Crane's force and to expect great things of him. He never entertained any serious doubt of Crane's loyalty, but he watched curiously the development of the character of a man exposed to Crane's peculiar temptations. That Crane had both good and bad qualities in great vigor he saw easily enough, but he could not tell which were the fundamentals. Crane was desperately poor, was foolishly proud, was rash and vainglorious, and was destined to shine brilliantly in the world of politics. What was to become of such a man? What usually became of such men? It was with these thoughts that Thorndyke at his lodgings, on a warm May night, listened to Crane's account of what had happened to him in the last few days.

He assured Crane that his conduct regarding Governor Sanders and the Senatorship seemed eminently sensible, after deducting the initial folly of it. And his making his first earnest attempt to save money at the very time when it might be expected he would become extravagant inclined Thorndyke to the belief that Crane was, after all, fundamentally honest.

Crane at that very moment suffered from a feeling of conscious guilt. He had begun to practice more than the one virtue of economy. He was practicing several others, but all with a view to his own advantage. One of them was that his wife should come on and visit him during the remainder of the session. She had not been in Washington for five years—not since that first unlucky venture in the Eleventh Street boarding-house.

He mentioned to Thorndyke his intention to send for his wife, and had the grace to say that it was because he was lonely without her—and in saying so he was conscious of uttering a colossal lie. But being inexpert as a liar he did badly, and felt ashamed of doing badly even in lying.

Thorndyke, on whom Annette Crane's simple and natural charm had made a strong impression, was pleased at the thought that Crane would pay her the compliment of having her with him and pleased at the thought of seeing her again.

"I shall be going West next week," he said, "and if Mrs. Crane is ready to come to Washington I shall be proud to escort her back."

"Thank you," answered Crane; "it would be a kindness to me as well as to Mrs. Crane. She is not an experienced traveler."

Both Thorndyke and Crane when they were together desired to keep Constance Maitland out of their conversation, but by one of those contradictory and involuntary impulses which cannot be accounted for her name always came up between them. This time it was by Crane's saying, after a while:

"Have you seen Miss Maitland lately?"

"I dined there night before last," answered Thorndyke.

Crane knew that Constance Maitland's favorite form of entertaining was at little dinners, which were perfection in the way of guests and service. He had never been asked to one of them, and thought gloomily that after Constance's very plain speaking to him at their last interview his chance of being invited was thin to attenuation.

"Was that the night that fellow Hudgins from Texas dined there?" asked Crane, who had not taken Constance's sound advice to cultivate reticence.

"Yes, and I never saw a better dinner man than Hudgins nor was ever at a more agreeable dinner."

"Bosh! Hudgins?"

"Yes, Hudgins. The fellow has a quiet manner, a soft voice, and the most delightful and archaic reverence for 'the ladies,' as he calls them. It is like what history tells us of General Sam Houston. Hudgins was a screaming success at the dinner."

Seeing that the account of Hudgins' triumph gave Crane acute discomfort, Thorndyke, lighting a fresh cigar, kept on remorselessly.

"Miss Maitland wanted to ask some really representative man to meet Sir Mark le Poer, a very agreeable and considerable Englishman, one of the permanent under-Secretaries in the British Foreign Office—he is a great friend of hers. He had been gorgeously entertained by all the retired tradespeople who are in the smart set here, but complained that he hadn't met any Americans—they would ask all the diplomats to meet him, fellows that bored him to death in Europe and still more so here. It seems that Miss Maitland had heard that the long, thin, soft-voiced Texan was delightful at dinner—so she asked me to bring him to call, and the dinner invitation followed. Besides Sir Mark and Hudgins and myself, there was Cathcart—a navy man—good old New England family, four generations in the navy, traveled man of the world, and flower of civilization. But Hudgins was easily the star of the occasion. There were three other women present besides Miss Maitland, all of them charming women, who know the world and command it; and the way they, as well as the Englishman and the naval officer, fell in love with Hudgins and his soft Texas accent, and his stupendous Texas yarns, and his way of looking at things—well, it was a show."

"Oh, come, Thorndyke—Hudgins!"

"Yes, Hudgins, I tell you. When the time came for the ladies to leave the table none of them wanted to go, and they said so. Then Hudgins rose and said in that inimitable manner of his, which catches the women every time, 'If Miss Maitland would kindly permit it, I'd rather a million times go into the parlor with her and the other ladies than stay out here with these fellows. I can get the society of men and a cigar any day, but it isn't often that I can bask in the presence of ladies like these present.' And the presumptuous dog actually walked off and left us in the lurch—and you can depend upon it, the women liked him better than any of us."

"If women are won by compliments like that any man can win their favor," said Crane crossly.

"My dear fellow, women know vastly more than we do. It wasn't Hudgins' compliments in words that won the women—it was his giving up his cigar and the extra glass of champagne and the society of men that fetched 'em—it was the sincerity of the thing. When we went into the drawing-room Hudgins was sitting on the piano stool telling them some sentimental story about his mother down in Texas when he started out in life, with nothing but the clothes on his back and a six-shooter in his pocket. The women were nearly in tears. As for the rest of us, including Sir Mark le Poer, we simply weren't in it with Hudgins. We stayed until nearly midnight; then the men adjourned to the club, where Hudgins kept us until three o'clock in the morning telling us more yarns about Texas. Sir Mark would hardly let him out of sight, and Hudgins has engaged to spend August with him in Scotland at a splendid place he has near Inverness. That's the way a man with great natural gifts of entertaining and being entertained can get on, if he has a chance."

Crane felt humiliated and disappointed. In all honesty, he could not imagine why he, with his recognized talents, his extreme good looks, his fondness for society, should have no such social triumphs as that long, lean, lanky Texan. He had not grasped the truth that society is a pure democracy, and until a man has abandoned all pretensions to superiority he will not be acceptable in it.

Just then along the dusky street a carriage came rolling. At Thorndyke's door it stopped, a footman descended from the box and assisted Senator Bicknell to alight.

"The Senator has come hunting you up," Thorndyke remarked to Crane. "When a man is anxious enough to see you to come after you, it is generally possible to make your own terms with him."

Crane's backbone was considerably stiffened by this remark of Thorndyke's and then Senator Bicknell walked into the room and greeted Thorndyke and Crane affably. He made an elaborate apology for seeking Crane, but said frankly he wished to discuss some matters of State politics with him.

Thorndyke at once rose to leave the room, but Crane, asking Senator Bicknell if he had any objection to Thorndyke's remaining and the Senator feebly agreeing to it, Thorndyke sat down again to enjoy the scrap. As it was not in his own party he was a perfectly disinterested listener.

"Mr. Crane," began Senator Bicknell in a dulcet voice, "I hardly think you realize what it means to our State organization to introduce discord into it at this time."

It was less than fourteen months before a national convention and the rainbow of a Presidential nomination had arisen upon Senator Bicknell's political horizon. This had happened more than once, but the Senator had never been able, heretofore, to catch the rainbow by the tail—yet, hope springs eternal in the human breast.

To this Crane replied firmly:

"I desire, Senator, to do everything I can to promote harmony in the State organization. It is Governor Sanders who is making trouble, and I shall defend myself from him, and die in the last ditch, if necessary."

Crane was by nature a gladiator, and the prospect of a fight by no means discomposed him.

Senator Bicknell sighed. He had already on his hands nine desperate fights in various parts of the State, and the prospect of a tenth fight, of a triangular nature at that, with two such sluggers as Crane and the Governor of the State, made the Senator's head ache. He looked sadly at Thorndyke and yearned after a knowledge of the secret by which his friend, Senator Standiford, could get hold of a man like Thorndyke, and keep him forever in a subordinate position, while he, Senator Bicknell, was always engaged in a tussle with his lieutenants.

Crane improved the opportunity to explain fully his position; and there could not be the slightest doubt that he had narrowly escaped from a conspiracy meant to ruin him.

A discussion followed which made a very important fact clear: that Crane had suddenly become a factor in State politics. Crane's color deepened as Senator Bicknell made a last effort with him for peace with Sanders, and when it was met with a firm refusal to accept the appointment Senator Bicknell dropped some words which indicated plainly that if forced to choose sides he might be with Crane. For a man who a month before had been obscure this was a vast though silent triumph.

After an hour's talk Senator Bicknell got up and departed. It was well on toward ten o'clock and Crane, too, rose to go. Thorndyke went out with him and they walked together as far as the foot of the hill at Connecticut Avenue. Then Thorndyke turned back, to indulge in a folly which had been his nightly since that first afternoon with Constance Maitland. It was to pass within sight of her house, then to return sick at heart to his own rooms and ask himself if he could be such a fool as to wish her to give up that charming home for lodgings such as he could afford.

Crane presently reached his quarters, a comfortable, suburban house with many verandas, and not unlike his own house at Circleville. On the table in his room lay a parcel, evidently containing photographs. He opened it and took out a photograph of his wife with her two children, Roger and Elizabeth, by her side. The children were handsome—the boy the sturdy, well-made replica of his father, the little girl her mother in miniature; both of them children of whom any father might be proud. As for Annette, the sweetness, the soft, appealing character of her beauty was singularly brought out in the photograph. Nor was there any suspicion of weakness in the face which most men would have fallen in love with on the spot.

But Crane was dissatisfied. She was not a woman even to be talked about. Crane would have liked a woman whose name would be in the newspapers every day. True, Constance Maitland kept out of them all she could, but she was too striking a personality not to attract the attention of the society correspondents. If she had been the wife of a public man she would have been in print as often as he was.

Still, Crane was glad he had sent for his wife. He had not realized until this crisis in his fate had come upon him what a mistake he had made in not having her with him sometimes. Not a man of his acquaintance who owned a wife but had her occasionally in Washington. He began to think with terror of what his enemies might have to say concerning this, and then, going to his table, wrote Annette another letter more urgent than his first, in his desire that she should come to Washington. He mentioned the chance that Thorndyke, who had never failed to show interest in her, had offered to escort her East. He felt like a hero and a martyr while writing this. But after he had posted his letter and had gone back to the balcony of his room and gazed out into the solemn night he had a return of that strange sense of guilt. He felt like a hypocrite; and, as he was not a hypocrite by nature, the feeling was uncomfortable. He put his request to Annette on the same ground he had alleged to Thorndyke—his wish to see her. And he ought to wish to see her—he did wish to see her; but the stillness of the night and the presence of the stars is disconcerting sometimes to one's conscience. The stars were very bright and it was wonderfully clear, although the moon was just rising. Tall apartment houses blazing with light made centres of radiance in the purple night. The Washington monolith was like a pillar of cloud, and the dome of the Capitol seemed suspended in mid-air. It was all very beautiful, but Crane saw nothing of its beauty. He saw before him only a struggle with stupendous forces—these he feared not—but also a struggle with himself; and this he feared!

He went to bed and slept uneasily. Next morning he rose with the intention of going to church—a thing he had not done for years. And in the practice of this virtue he committed an act of the greatest hypocrisy. He knew the very hour when Hardeman, the correspondent of his home paper, took his Sunday morning stroll on Connecticut Avenue. Crane timed his own appearance so that he met Hardeman directly in front of the Austrian Embassy.

In half a minute afterward Crane mentioned that he was on his way to church.

As he spoke Hardeman took a newspaper out of his pocket and, opening it, held it up before Crane. On the first page, with the most violent display head, was the official announcement of his appointment by Governor Sanders to the unexpired time of the late Senator Brand's term.

Crane turned pale. He was ready for the fight, but the fight had come unexpectedly soon. And that it was to be to the knife, and knife to the hilt, was now perfectly plain.

"Come with me," said he to Hardeman, "and I'll tell you all about it."

They turned back to Dupont Circle, seated themselves on a bench left vacant by a colored brother, and Crane told the whole story to Hardeman to be printed next day.

As he talked his course of action, simple, aboveboard and effective, at once took shape in his mind. He wrote out on a pocket pad a letter to the Governor, saying, as the Governor had thought fit to make the public aware of his action in the Senatorship before communicating with Crane himself, that he, Crane, should do likewise, and make a public declination of it. He then gave a brief statement of what had passed, inserted a copy of his first letter to the Governor and reiterated his refusal to accept the Senatorship. Hardeman, a keen-eyed man, was in the seventh heaven of delight. The letter would, of course, be sent to the Associated Press, but there was "a good story" for the home paper, and a specific mention that Representative Crane was on his way to church when the news was communicated to him.

Crane, still pale, rose and announced that he should keep on to church—a fact also certain to be chronicled. Church was a very good place to think out the problems which would come out of this extraordinary and far-reaching fight.

He went on, sat through a long sermon of which he heard not a word, listened to the musical gymnastics of a high-priced quartette and gradually became himself, or rather, more than himself, for the fight at hand brought out in him all the thews and sinews of courage, foresight and judgment. At the very last, when the name of God was mentioned in the final prayer, Crane had one moment of sincere piety. Otherwise his thoughts were very far from pious, being absolutely those of self-seeking and revenge. Like other men, he promised himself that when Mammon had granted him all he wanted then he would turn to God.

When he found himself on the street again it was a little past twelve o'clock. He turned into the side streets to escape the throng of people going home from church. As he walked under the arcade of the sweet-smelling tulip trees, with the May sunshine filtering through, he felt the ever-present longing for sympathy. He would have liked to go to Constance Maitland, but something in her tone and manner at their last meeting made him afraid.

On that former occasion he had scarcely been master of himself, he did not know when he was offending her, but now he was far more composed. Yet he dared not go.

While these thoughts were passing through his mind he looked up and saw Constance coming down the street under the dappled shadows of the tulip trees. She was dressed simply in black, but Crane had never been more struck by the distinction of her appearance. With her was a fine-looking man whom Crane surmised was Cathcart, the naval man.

Crane intended to pass the pair without stopping, but when he raised his hat Constance halted him. There was that ever-present feeling of pity for him, and she was conscious of having said some hard things to him in that last interview.

"I have glanced at the newspaper this morning," she said, "and I fancy your friend, Governor Sanders, has treated you rather shabbily."

"Very shabbily," replied Crane smiling; "he has driven me to the wall, but he will find me fighting with my back to the wall."

Then Constance introduced her companion, and it was Cathcart, after all.

"You can't expect much sympathy from me, Mr. Crane," said Cathcart smiling. "If it had not been for you and your colleagues I might have been in command of a ship at this moment, making a run for the Caribbean Sea. You did us naval men a bad turn by forcing those beggars to back down without striking a blow."

Cathcart, like all naval men, was eager to play the great game of war with the new implements lately acquired, and did not welcome the exercise of peaceful power which had forced an amicable arrangement of a dangerous question.

Just then a handsome victoria drew up at the sidewalk. In it sat Mrs. Hill-Smith, the widowed daughter of the Secretary of State, and a beautifully dressed, high-bred looking girl, Eleanor Baldwin. Baldwin, père, whose cards read, "Mr. James Brentwood Baldwin," was the successful inventor of a machine for stitching shoes, which had brought him a great fortune early in life, and had enabled him to establish himself in Washington and adopt the rôle of a gentleman of leisure and of inherited fortune. His daughter looked like the younger sister of Lady Clara Vere de Vere, as Mrs. Hill-Smith, Cap'n Josh Slater's granddaughter, looked like Lady Clara Vere de Vere herself.

Mrs. Hill-Smith beckoned to Constance, who approached, leaving the two men a little distance away, talking together under the overhanging branches of the tulip trees.

"My dear girl," said Mrs. Hill-Smith, who had adopted the "dear girl" mode of addressing all women like herself over thirty-five, "you must come to the meeting of the Guild for Superannuated Governesses which is to be organized at my house to-morrow. It is a branch of the one presided over in London by the Princess Christian"—and Mrs. Hill-Smith ran over glibly a number of names of ladies of the diplomatic corps in Washington who were interested in it, winding up with, "And we can't get on without you."

Constance Maitland's full gaze had in it power over women as well as over men, and Mrs. Hill-Smith was not quite certain whether there was a laugh or not in Constance's deep, dark eyes, as turning them on her she replied:

"Very well—but my first proposition will be revolutionary, I warn you. I shall suggest that we pay governesses enough to enable them to save something, and thus we can get hold of the economic problem by the head instead of by the tail."

Was she really in earnest? Mrs. Hill-Smith did not know, but there was certainly a flippancy in Constance's tone which shocked both Mrs. Hill-Smith and Miss Baldwin. The serious, hard-working women by whom they were mothered and grandmothered had given them a deadly seriousness and energy in the pursuit of social schemes and pleasures, just as their forebears had industriously and seriously washed and baked and brewed.

Mrs. Hill-Smith was so annoyed by Constance's manner of receiving her communication that if Constance had not been very intimate at the British Embassy Mrs. Hill-Smith would have made her displeasure felt. But she was constitutionally timid, like all social newcomers—timid in admitting people into her circle, and timid in turning them out—so she merely smiled brightly and said as they drove off:

"You'll come like a dear, and be as revolutionary-as you please. Good-by."

Constance, with her two men, lingered a minute, and then Crane left her. He yearned for his stenographer, and set out to seek him. Cathcart walked home with Constance and left her at her door. She was malicious enough to describe to him some of Mrs. Hill-Smith's charities, at which Cathcart was in an ecstasy of amusement.

Meanwhile, Mrs. Hill-Smith went home with Eleanor Baldwin to what they called breakfast, but most Americans call luncheon. On the way the two women had discussed Constance Maitland cautiously—each afraid to let on to the other what she really thought—because, after all, Constance was intimate at the British Embassy.

Arrived at the Baldwin house—an imposing white stone mansion with twenty-five bedrooms for a family of four, of whom one was a boy at school, a family which never had a visitor overnight—Eleanor led the way to the library where her father sat.

It was a great, high-ceiled, cool room, dark in spite of many windows and a glass door opening on a balcony. At a library table near the glass door sat Mr. James Brentwood Baldwin, alias Jim Baldwin, and on the balcony outside, sat Mrs. James Brentwood Baldwin, née Hogan.

"IT IS GOVERNOR SANDERS WHO IS MAKING TROUBLE"

It was easy to see whence Eleanor Baldwin had got her beauty. Jim Baldwin was handsome, Nora Hogan Baldwin was handsomer.

From the days when Jim Baldwin had carried home parcels of tea and buckets of butter in his future father-in-law's corner grocery he had cherished an honorable ambition to have a great big library full of books. In the course of time, through the operations of the shoe-stitching machine, he had been able to gratify this ambition and taste. He had all of those books which Charles Lamb declares "are no books—that is, all the books which no gentleman's library should be without." They were all bound sumptuously in calf, and editions de luxe were as common as flies in a baker's shop. The four vast walls were lined with these treasures, and from them Baldwin derived an excess of pleasure. This was not by reading them—he had never read a book in his life. Two Chicago newspapers, one from New York, and the Washington morning and evening journals satisfied his cravings for knowledge. But he got from the outside of his books all the pleasure that most people get from the inside. He justly felt that to be seen surrounded by the glorious company of the living who died a thousand years ago, and the conspicuous dead who live to-day, was to give him dignity and poise. Nobody but himself knew that he never read. His days were spent in his library—he always spoke of himself as "among my books," and shrewd, sharp and keen as he was and ever must remain, he had actually succeeded in bamboozling himself into the notion that he was a person of "literary tastes."

Mrs. Baldwin was one of the handsomest women in Washington, and considered quite the proudest. Her abundant gray hair, setting off a face of Greek beauty, gave her a look as of a queen in the days of powder and patches. She had a rarity of speech, a way of looking straight ahead of her, which were regal. But this exterior of pride was really a result of the sincerest bashfulness and reserve. When Nora Hogan, the grocer's daughter, had married Jim Baldwin, the contractor's son, Fortune was already smiling on Jim. Then suddenly she opened her apron and deluged him with gold. Mrs. Baldwin was frightened and stunned. She was afraid to say much for fear she might make mistakes—so she gradually came to saying nothing at all. She dreaded to look from side to side for fear she might find some one laughing at her. So she always looked straight ahead of her. By degrees she acquired a degree of coldness, of stiffness, that was perfectly well suited to the mother of Lady Clara Vere de Vere. She was, of course, an unhappy woman, being a misjudged one. Her chief solace lay in the practice of secret acts of charity among the poorest of the poor, not letting her left hand know what her right hand did. The promoters of fashionable charities complained that Mrs. Baldwin was so stately and so unsympathetic that they could not get on with her in charitable work. True it is that at the meetings for fashionable charities Mrs. Baldwin would be more silent, more queenly than ever, but her heart would be crying aloud for the poor who are born to suffer and to die, and to help them she would cheerfully have given the very clothes off her back. But cowardice kept her silent, as it kept her silent in the presence of her servants, whom she feared inexpressibly.

If Mrs. Baldwin was constitutionally timid, not so Eleanor. All the courage of her father had gone into his willowy, beautiful, well-groomed daughter. Her first recollections were of the inland town where they lived secluded in their big house, because nobody was good enough for them to associate with after their fortune was made. Then she was taken to Europe and returned a finished product, with no more notion of what the word "American" meant than if she had been a daughter of the Hapsburgs. As a compromise between Europe and America Baldwin had pitched upon Washington as a place of residence. His social status had been agreeably fixed by a lucky accident—he had been asked to be pallbearer for a foreign Minister who died in Washington. Baldwin rightly considered the dead diplomat worth, to him, all the live ones going—for, having assisted in carrying the dead man from the Legation to the hearse, Baldwin was, in consequence, elected to the swell club, asked to the smart cotillon, and made more headway in a month in the smart set than he could have made otherwise in a year. He repaired his debt to the dead diplomat by buying some very ordinary pictures at the sale of the Minister's effects, and paying the most extravagant price ever heard of for them.

To Eleanor their social rise was nothing surprising. She expected it, having been bred like a young princess, only with less of democracy than real princesses are bred. When she entered the room with Mrs. Hill-Smith, Baldwin rose and responded smilingly to Mrs. Hill-Smith's remark:

"Here you are, as usual, among your books."

"Yes—as usual, among my books. I dare say your father, the Secretary, spends a good deal of time among his books."

"Oh, yes," replied Mrs. Hill-Smith airily, "but he has been dreadfully put out of late. Congress has been so troublesome. I don't know exactly how, but it has annoyed papa extremely."

"Very reprehensible," said Baldwin earnestly, who had the opinion of the average commercial man that Congress is a machine to create prosperity, or its reverse, and if prosperity is not created Congressmen are blamed fools.

"I hate Congressmen—except a few from New York," said Eleanor, drawing off her gloves daintily. "There was one talking with Miss Maitland when we stopped her on the street just now. The creature was introduced to me at one of those queer Southern houses where they introduce people without asking permission first, and ever since then the man has tried to talk to me whenever we meet. But I really couldn't stand him. This morning I cut him dead. His name is Crane, and he's from somewhere in the West."

Now, it happened that there was another Crane in the House from the West, and Baldwin had a business motive for wishing to cultivate this particular Crane—and business was business still with Jim Baldwin. So, at Eleanor's words, he turned on her. His air of scholar-and-gentleman, man-of-the-world, and person-of-inherited-leisure suddenly dropped from him; he was once more Jim Baldwin, the shoe-stitching-machine man.

"Then let me tell you," he said authoritatively, "you made a big mistake. That man Crane is on the Committee on Manufactures, and we have been arguing with him, and sending the most expensive men we have to prove to him that we are entitled to the same rebate on the platinum used in our machines as The Oshkosh Shoe-Stitching Machine people get—and I have reason to know that Crane is the man standing in the way. I wish you had snuggled right up to him."

Eleanor surveyed her father with cold displeasure. Mrs. Hill-Smith was politely oblivious, especially of the word

Poor Richard Junior's Philosophy

¶ No clouds, no rain; no rain, no crops.

¶ Avoid the luxury that becomes a necessity.

¶ The bachelor girl is the old maid in a new edition.

¶ It is well to put off until to-morrow what you ought not to do at all.

¶ The man who is his own worst enemy generally loves his enemy.

¶ The devil may have his faults, but procrastination is not one of them.

¶ A father is fonder of a strapping boy than a son is of a strapping father.

¶ It is only the parrot that is valued for how it talks rather than for what it says.

¶ There are lots of people who are just about as superfluous as a tin can tied to a yellow dog's tail.

¶ Many persons never find the business they like because they want the business to do all the liking.

¶ When we reach a certain age we begin to wonder at the enthusiasm children display over their birthdays.

¶ There are much more eloquent indications of the ragged edge of despair than the fringe around the bottom of a man's trousers.

¶ Nature gives the poor an appetite that they may like what they eat. The rich do not need one as they can eat what they like.

The Kindergarten for Parents

CAPTAIN X, of one of the largest ocean steamers, said recently: "I never make a voyage without being struck by the overindulgence of American parents of the well-to-do classes. They make only the feeblest attempts to discipline their children and encourage them in every breach of manners and of the laws of health and conduct. On my last voyage there was a boy of eleven whom his parents permitted to eat and drink precisely what they did; to interrupt them and order them about. He began dinner every night with a handful of nuts; he drank claret and champagne; he was up early, yet was on deck as late as the latest. His father said to me: 'His mother and I feel that we owe it to him to make him happy. As children we were both handled strictly and severely, and we resolved that we would not give our children the memories of childhood and of our parents that we have.'"

After due allowance for the difference between American and European ideals of manhood and womanhood, it must still be admitted that there is much justice in this English sea-captain's criticism. And the last sentence of the preposterous parent's remarks to him explains many and many an amazing case of what he attacks. Of the volumes that could be written on "man's inhumanity to man," the thickest and most heart-rending would be that on the sufferings of children through the mistaken notions of grown people as to child nature and child discipline. Children have been almost universally misunderstood, have been in all times and places punished instead of corrected, have paid unjust penalties for innocently following the instincts of heredity and the example inadvertently set them by their very human parents.

Of late, in America there has been a sudden burst of repentance and regret, a sharp swing of the pendulum from the extreme of sternness to the extreme of softness. And no doubt this has been expedited by the American passion which is responsible for the best of our good fortune and the worst of our woes—our passion for the sentiment expressed in Walt Whitman's advice to us—"Obey little; resist much!"

We do not want English or German discipline of children introduced here—we are not in the business of manufacturing either subjects for kings or "cannon food." What we want is sovereign men and sovereign women. The two main attributes of that sovereignty are:

Self-respect.

Self-control.

Beating children will not produce these qualities, nor will bullying them. On the other hand, license is fatal to any proper self-respect, is inevitably fatal to any sort of self-control whatsoever. On paper and in theory it is very easy to draw the line between license and liberty, between the discipline that will develop and the discipline that will degrade. In practice it is by no means easy—not because children are difficult to teach, for they are easy to teach; but because so few of us frail, halting human beings have proper working conceptions of self-respect and self-control.

But it is possible, though perhaps difficult, for a parent to develop himself to the point where he can teach his child—it must be largely by example—to set a high standard of self-respect, and to try to help his child to the self-control which living up to that standard calls for. It is certainly possible not to breed fear in a child's mind. A child that fears its parents is in the beginnings of lying and cowardice.

A child that has been beaten is a child that has been brutalized. And as for the parent who gives the beating, does he, or she, never think how it came to pass that a being absolutely under his, or her, control needs to be degraded with a whipping; does he, or she, never think what must be the nature of his own manhood, or of her own womanhood, when its highest conception of correction is physical torture?

Beating and bullying teach only deception—is it not generally conceded that there is no moral turpitude in deceiving a tyrant who takes advantage of helplessness to torture?

Perhaps, on the whole, the best way to teach a child self-respect and self-reliance is never to do before it anything which one would not be perfectly willing for it to do. Does that mean self-sacrifice? Does that mean cutting off one's own pet self-indulgence? Undoubtedly. But, of course, all parents will gladly do this. They are always assuring everybody that they live chiefly for their children, that they love them, that their highest ambition is to see them grow to sound manhood and womanhood. It will be all joy to them to suppress in themselves the angry word, the inconsiderate action, the bad habit which they would have to punish severely in their beloved offspring should it "do as papa and mamma do" and not as papa and mamma say.

Parents can learn as much about themselves from their children as they can about their faces from a mirror. If the image is repellent, is the mirror to blame?

The Fatal Plunge

A VEHEMENT controversy has been going on lately between some of our contemporaries as to the relative cost of living in different American cities. The newly-married couple with a small income are the objects of this anxious solicitude. Details of information are lavishly poured out upon them. They are assured that they can rent a whole house in Philadelphia for the cost of a tiny flat in New York; but on the other hand, New York will give them ready-made clothes for a song; Chicago will sell them meat at a reduction of three cents a pound; in Baltimore shell-fish are almost as cheap as air, while in Boston, food, rents, gas and fuel mount to an impossible height—only books are free.

Tens of thousands of young married folk—or young folk who want to marry and dare not make the fatal plunge—are no doubt studying these price lists with bated breath to-day. But, after all, it is not the price of flats, or butter, or coal that will determine their future expenses, but a fact much more subtle and important: the Public Opinion, the unwritten law of the community in which they elect to make their home. That is a bodiless ruler which controls all of us, whether we know it or not. It regulates our outlay, our behavior, and, sooner or later, our lives.

In one city money is the gauge by which each man is rated. Has he millions, a comfortable salary or nothing? Then is he noble, respectable, or of no more account than the brutes. No matter what the income of our young couple may be they will always be wretched there, because it is not bigger.

In another town, if they can claim some old soldier at Valley Forge as a grandfather, they may live over a baker's shop and give dinners of mutton hash; they still will rank among the ruling class.

The challenge at the gates of still another American town is—"What have you done?" If our beginners can write a book, or paint a picture or start a new religion, or a new doubt of the old religion, they will have friends and applause enough to warm and feed them.

Every American village and every clique in a village has its unpublished law as to the quality which constitutes the "better class" and the scale of outlay proper for that class, and it is this which should decide our beginners in the choice of a home rather than the current price of mutton or potatoes.

It is a curious fact that most young married couples try to push their way into a neighborhood of richer and more pretentious people than themselves. Tom is a scholarly fellow and Jessie has a good ear and a fine touch in her music. Why should they choose to live among people who value their songs or clever talk no higher than the tricks of animals, but who value them by the cost of their clothes or their dinners? Why not find friends at the outset among their own kind? Why should Tom struggle to visit and keep pace with millionaires and so bring on himself the ridicule of his neighbors now, and paresis in his old age? He probably never can buy a yacht for his son or a poor earl for his daughter. Then let him keep out of sight of yachts and earls and so command comfort and peace in his life at the outset.

Some of our modern preachers urge us to consort with millionaires while we live a simple life. St. Francis, they tell us, trampled his rich clothes under foot in the face of the nobles, and Epictetus, in the midst of the glories of the court, rejoiced loudly that his soul was above these things.

If there be a St. Francis or an Epictetus among us let him carry his message to Newport or to Fifth Avenue.

But for the rank and file of us it will be wiser to live in the shade and keep out of temptation.

An Important Baby

MOST Americans would be astonished if told that the birth of an heir to any European throne was of any great importance to this country; and yet the future of the United States, the future of the Monroe Doctrine, and the future of South America may be very seriously affected by the failure of the young Queen of Holland to have issue.

The heir to the throne of Holland, in the eventuality of the Queen dying without issue, would be a German Prince, who, though he would be obliged to swear allegiance to the Dutch Constitution and must promise to protect the independence of the Netherlands, would nevertheless be strongly German in sympathy, and therefore could hardly be expected to make a very sturdy battle against any attempt of the German Emperor to possess himself of the little Kingdom. That Germany wants Holland every one knows, and that the other Powers would hardly be likely to interfere very seriously if Berlin found some excuse for gobbling her up is also very near a certainty. If France protested she might be allowed to annex Belgium. Russia and Austria, of course, would not take a hand in the matter, as it is too remote from their spheres of influence and interests, and England alone is hardly likely to undertake a war over Holland with Germany.

If Holland should pass to Germany of course her colonies would go with the mother country, and the German Emperor would have acquired by means that it would be impossible to prevent, or even to protest against, the much-desired territory in this hemisphere. Dutch Guiana is an immense territory in itself, but of more importance yet are the Dutch islands in the Caribbean Sea, especially Curaçoa.

It cannot be doubted that, with that island and its two or three Dutch neighbors in his possession, the German Emperor or his successors would at once fortify them strongly, and would make them the headquarters for a West Indian fleet which would be a continual menace to the Inter-Oceanic Canal, and a constant cause of irritation to the United States. Troops could be landed not only on the island but on the Dutch mainland as well, and the independence of Brazil would be continually menaced. If the Germans, who now number 400,000 in Brazil, should start a revolt against the Brazilian Government the German troops would be at hand to help them, and would have both a nearer and a better base of supplies than the United States.

It is clear, therefore, that it is a matter of no little concern to Americans that there should be a Dutch heir to the Dutch throne, so that all danger of the Dutch American colonies passing to German control may disappear.

The Business Side of Cup Racing

THE BUILDING OF A DEFENDER HAS BECOME A VERY SCIENTIFIC, UNEMOTIONAL AFFAIR, CARRIED OUT AT GREAT COST WITH GREAT PRECISION AND WITH THE UTMOST SECRECY

BY WINFIELD M. THOMPSON

ONE often hears the principle laid down that business methods should not be applied to a gentleman's sport, yet the highest development of the leading sport of the day—racing yachts for the America's cup—has been attained along the lines of careful business organization.

Under existing conditions the America's cup is defended by a syndicate of business men with ample means, who, as soon as a challenge is received, voluntarily subscribe sufficient money to build and equip a proper vessel for the defense, and keep her in commission throughout the racing season. None of these men need know the rudiments of sailing a vessel, for their responsibility ceases when they have written checks sufficiently large to cover all contingencies of the defense. Their money acts for them as soon as it is placed to the order of the specialist, and they never know the sentiment and pleasure that thrilled the old-time yachtsman when paying for the vessel in which he dreamed of cruising, entertaining, and perhaps racing, as chance came; for the business methods of the day have put sentiment to flight in cup racing, so far as it may be held by financially interested individuals.

Whatever sentiment clings to the defense of the cup pertains no more to one citizen than another, and the man who pays for a boat can lay claim to no more of it than the urchin in the street; while his enjoyment may be dulled, if he is of nervous temperament, by the fear that defeat may come through some shortcoming in the elaborate arrangements that must be made for the match.

As in every highly specialized field of effort, the business of racing for the defense of the cup must be in the hands of one master. The man capable of assuming leadership in this field is in the highest sense an expert. By courtesy he is an amateur, or Corinthian yachtsman, as he receives no fixed sum for his services; but in fact he is an expert at defending the America's cup, and is recognized by the public solely in this connection. His ability does not lie in skill in sailing the cup yacht, for he is not called upon to do that, but in organizing a crew and "getting everything out of them"; a man of iron will and great energy, known aboard ship as a "driver," and distinguished in the racing field for allowing nothing to come between him and his chance of victory. He is fully conscious that the difference between victory and defeat may lie in some minor detail of arrangement, and he makes himself and all his men slaves to the need of preparedness. He is not there for health or pleasure, but to keep the cup for his syndicate and his club. If his crew prove better in concerted action, and win a close race—perhaps the deciding one in a series—by expeditious and careful handling of sails, their work is his reward of merit with the men for whom he acts, and a hard-earned tribute to his ability as an organizer. He has trained his men according to special rules of conduct applying to cup racing, and not according to the older canons of seamanship. He has drilled each man to consider himself a part of the whole, while performing unquestioningly the duties of his special post without considering what his neighbor may be doing, except as it affects his own work.

No Room for Sentiment or Chance

IN THE preparation of a yacht to race for the America's cup nothing is left to sentiment, impulse or chance. The proposition rests on business principles throughout. Only the famous designer known to have produced winners in the past is intrusted with an order to build a vessel intended for the defense. Other designers may yearn for an opportunity to show the world their genius, but it would not be safe to give them a chance. Their boat might lose.

The famous designer has the confidence of the syndicate to such a degree that he is not asked to show the lines of his boat. They are quite sure to be as good as could be produced; and if they are not, the syndicate has the benefit of a businesslike reservation that its defending yacht need not be named until the week before the date set for the first race, while the challenger must have committed himself to sail only with the boat named in his challenge sent ten months before the event. Thus, as an example, the yacht Constitution was designed in 1901 to sail against Shamrock II. She did not prove satisfactory, and Columbia, which defended the cup in 1899, was again used as the defending vessel. On the other hand, the challenger's vessel proved in her trials to be of doubtful powers in construction and design; but the challenger was obliged to sail the races with her, as he did not enjoy the privilege of making a change.

In this connection it may be said that the failure of Constitution was charged largely to lack of training of the crew and absence of decision in handling; a charge, in effect, that her manager was not sufficiently expert at the business of developing speed in a cup-racing machine. The same conditions were held also to have affected the fortunes of the challenger.

As the craft used in racing for the America's cup represent the limit to which yacht designing and construction have been carried, it is but logical that their production should be a special industry. Among all the ship-building plants of the world there are scarce a half-dozen that could satisfy the demands made on the industry by the construction of a cup-racing yacht; while in the designing field are but three men who in the past decade have had a chance to show their powers in this branch of design. There is in these facts ample evidence of the specialization existing in the sport of cup racing.

Twenty years have wrought as great a change in this line of industry as in any in our rapidly-growing country. In 1881 the order was given by the flag-officers of the New York Yacht Club for the first vessel to be specially constructed as a defender of the America's cup. Her builder was David Kirby, of Rye, New York, who worked out his models by the old-time method of rule-of-thumb plus experience, and then built the craft himself, in the light of day, shaping her timbers from such honest wood that the yacht, called Pocahontas, is alive to-day and giving good service. That she was rejected for the defense showed she represented the end of an epoch, for the yacht which displaced her, Mischief, was built of iron, from lines drawn by A. Cary Smith, now dean of American naval architects.

In these days yachts are designed and built after the methods of the magician in producing a rabbit from his hat. All the labors of the designer, who in the case of recent defending yachts has been also the builder, have been secret. He is a man of mystery, a wizard working in his hidden chamber, and he recognizes the right of none, even the men who pay for his boats, to see the lines from which his racers are built. Sentiment does not rule him. He owes the sport of yachting nothing. He is moved by no desire to give the world the fruits of his genius, except in concrete form, for racing purposes, at very high prices. He represents the business spirit of the age as applied to the sport of yachting.

The old days when the builder set up his vessel's timbers in his open yard by sea or sound, and friendly critics came from far and near to view them and to add a word of cheer or a well-meant suggestion, are far away indeed. The builder of to-day knows, before a blow is struck on his vessel, how she will look when in the water, and to what line on her hull she will float. Her weight has been calculated to a pound. Her displacement and its distribution, her probable resistance when under sail—all have been set down in advance, in accordance with the demands of modern business methods.

When the boat is launched the results obtained by such methods is witnessed in her appearance. Everything in her hull and rig has been designed to obtain lightness of construction combined with sufficient strength to carry a great spread of sail. The plates of her hull, made from a composition of metals manufactured by a secret process for this special purpose, are no thicker than a dinner plate. She has no bulwarks or rails, as sea-going craft have. Her deck is of thin aluminum, covered with canvas or cork to give the men a foothold. A sharp marlinspike dropped the distance of three feet would pierce it.

The towering spars of a cup racer are hollow, built of thin steel plates over truss work of steel. Such spars have the merit of lightness, but can be used only for racing. When a yacht crosses the ocean, as in the case of the challenger, her tall racing mast is shipped by steamer to the yacht's destination.

The majority of the lighter spars on a racing yacht are made of wood, except the main-boom, which is of steel. The use of hollow wood spars is a direct result of the demands of the day for lightness aloft, and their manufacture is a special business, practically controlled by one American firm. The wood used is the lightest pine, a spar being made of two or more hollowed parts glued together and shaped.

Costly Sails of a Special Weave

IN KEEPING with hollow spars are the cup yacht's racing sails, which are made of "special yacht duck," a fabric manufactured from a particular kind of cotton, and woven in a particular kind of way. One American firm enjoys the distinction of making the best American racing sails, and this distinction has been gained through developing the business along special lines. The senior member of the firm, for example, learned the business of weaving cotton duck in order to produce a fabric suitable for the exacting requirements of large racing yachts. He experimented with many kinds of duck before finding one that stood the test of severe usage in racing. Egyptian and sea-island cotton, ramie and other fibres were used and discarded, but at last a cotton was found that proved satisfactory. The cotton-mill agents at first laughed at the sailmaker who thought he could tell them something about weaving duck. They ceased laughing some time ago, while the special duck of that particular firm has done much toward placing the firm at the head of the business of sailmaking in America. So much for specialization in that particular branch of yachting.

But cotton is not always considered good enough for making light sails for a vessel of the cup class. The ill-starred Independence, of Boston, had a spinnaker made of equal parts of white silk and mercerized sea-island cotton, at a cost of something more than $1700. The sail was never spread.

Great ingenuity is displayed in obtaining lightness and strength in the rigging of a modern racer. Hemp has been entirely displaced by wire of plow steel for standing rigging, while flexible steel is now used for running rigging, such as halyards. The use of steel wire greatly increases the strength of a rig, and reduces resistance to the wind. Wire rigging came into use on American yachts in the early seventies, and the tendency has been to make it lighter with each succeeding season.

When the cup racer is put in commission a period of hard work and worry, that will end only with the races, begins for all hands, from the manager to the last man in the crew. Of necessity the veil of secrecy behind which the boat was built and equipped is now lifted, and the men in charge of the vessel enter upon a sort of stewardship to the public; for the public has a way of considering itself concerned in the races by reason of inalienable proprietary rights in the trophy to be sailed for.

The Flotilla of Caretakers and Tenders

ONE of the first duties of her crew is to see that no harm shall come to the yacht. This necessitates ceaseless vigilance. As the vessel may draw twenty feet of water she cannot be sailed in shallow places, or near sands, rocks or reefs. As she is too fragile in hull and spars to be risked unnecessarily in a seaway, she must not be taken far to sea, nor must she be exposed needlessly to squalls. Hard usage at sea might start her plates at some point in the hull where the strain is great, possibly near the mast-step. This might cause a leak that could not be made tight, and lead to loss of time, endless worry and apprehension, and perhaps defeat.

In harbor the yacht must be anchored always in sheltered places, where tugs with tows of barges cannot come into collision with her, or vagrant coasting vessels foul her. She must have good holding ground in deep water, and some one must be always on watch to see that she rides well to her mooring.

As a cup defender has no living quarters on board for her crew, quarters must be provided for them on an accompanying vessel or tender. This is generally a steamer, and each racing year sees a larger tender procured for the use of the defender's crew. Then a launch is generally employed as a tender to the tender. This craft may belong to one of the syndicate, and be a seventy-foot, high-power boat with a twenty-knot speed.

The yacht's tender must be fitted with sleeping and victualing accommodations for the crew, enlarged space for cooks and stewards, and a clear space for extra spars, sails and fittings that cannot be carried on the yacht. Sometimes, if the tender is comparatively small, the spars are carried on a lighter, which must be towed about by a tug. This increases the number of vessels in the yacht's entourage to four; while in the case of one cup racer in recent years no fewer than seven satellites followed in her wake.

The disbursements on account of a cup-racing yacht, for a season, including first cost, are from $200,000 to $350,000. The only authentic statement available of the cost of a vessel of this class was published by Mr. Thomas W. Lawson, owner of the Independence, who showed that the boat cost him $205,000 to build and operate for three months. The money was spent with a lavish hand, but the total reached doubtless was less than that for a cup defender, chiefly because of the high figures at which everything connected with a cup yacht is charged to the syndicate. Constitution was said to have cost her owners $320,000 by the end of her first season. If this were a correct figure, her building and equipping was not without a handsome profit.

For crew the present cup defender carries about forty men, who are paid forty or forty-five dollars a month, with a bonus for each race won. Her sailing master is said to receive $5000 for the season, which is higher than is paid the best of ordinary skippers, from the fact that he is a specialist in sailing vessels of this class. The mate receives about $1500. The manager receives no salary, but is said to have an allowance of $10,000 for expenses, which would appear to be ample.

National pride is not permitted to enter into consideration in selecting the crew of a defender. No one on the yacht need be native born. The crew of Columbia in 1901 was composed of Scandinavians. Her captain, who is again chosen to sail the defender this year, is a Scotchman.

In 1895 a fine glow of patriotism warmed the popular heart when an all-Yankee crew, from Deer Isle, Maine, was chosen to sail on the Defender. The crew was composed of as fine sailors as ever took a turn, but they did not commend themselves to their manager as superior to Scandinavians. "They're too cute, them down-Easters," said a racing skipper. "I'd rather have 'square-heads': you can lick 'em into shape better."

Wherein is shown that in cup racing appreciation of the independence of American seamen, like many another popular sentiment, is made subservient to considerations of organization.

SECTIONAL
(PATENTED)

Are the "Standard of the World" for quality. They received the Gold Medals—the highest awards—at both the Pan-American and Charleston Expositions. They cost more to make, but by buying direct from us (the makers) the cost to you is about the same as other kinds.

$14.00 buys this "Macey" Book-Case No. 107-B exactly as illustrated (except the statuary and books), made of quarter-sawed oak, finely figured and polished, sent "On Approval," Freight Prepaid east of the Miss. and north of Tenn. (points beyond equalized), to be returned at our expense if not by far the best bookcase at so low a price. This same Book-Case in genuine solid mahogany, with pretty bird's-eye maple interior for $18.50—same terms. We make several sizes and grades, some as low as $1.00 per section (these without doors).

This Book-Case has 5 sections: 1 Top—1 Base (with a drawer)—3 Book sections with glass doors, and each door has an ingenious device (patented by us) whereby it can never bind or stick in any climate, and when open recedes automatically over the books. All doors are dust proof.

All it costs to learn all about the "Macey" Book-Case is to ask for catalogue No. "R-1."

Base sections with drawers can now be had—just the thing for catalogues, odd articles, etc.

A New Feature

JUNE BRIDES! Of course you will have some good books and fancy gifts, and will need a nice dust-proof place to keep them, which means a "Macey" Sectional Book-Case—the kind that GROWS—and we propose to make it so easy to start right that you can't afford to start wrong; and to every June bride ordering the above Book-Case made of genuine solid mahogany with pretty bird's-eye maple interior—the best in the world—we will make no charge for the base section (the "starter") but will include it as a wedding gift with our compliments and very best wishes. This means that every June bride can buy a Book-Case that we always sell at $18.50 (never less), for $15.00—Freight Prepaid by us (see above). This offer expires July 15, 1903.

$24.00 BUYS THIS "MACEY" DESK No. 37-A

AMERICAN NIGHTS ENTERTAINMENT

the next week. When it comes to hustling Sternmeyer & Meyerstern are supposed to be pretty quick, but, if I do say it, I had them gasping. I made them get out an edition of fifty thousand at the start with a cover design made by one of my own artists—the fellow who did those stunning posters for the Block Island Road that I showed some of you the other day in my office—and owing to my influence as an advertising man I induced some of the old-line houses to handle the song. I also hired through my representatives small boys who belonged to church choirs in the various big cities of the country. They were trained to stand outside of the matinée houses just about the close of the play and sing the song as a quartette and also to distribute handbills at the same time—and it caught the caramel chewers on the first bounce. Of course the little choristers were voted too sweet for any use and the song sold like hot cakes. Then I took up a column in every one of the leading papers all over the country asking the question, 'Do you sing (never mind what song it was)? If not, why not? It is good for the voice. Indorsed by every one with a throat. For sale at all music stores.'

"Not only that, but I induced every orchestra leader in New York to play my song at least twice every evening, and in one fashionable uptown church it was sung as an offertory with religious words, and that started up a rumpus that was worth good money to me. And of course I got them to sing it at Feber and Wields.

"Well, most of you knew at the time how the song took hold, although I haven't mentioned its name, purposely. It went like wild-fire all over the country, and Sousa, who was at the Paris Exposition, played it in that city, and it made quite an impression on the boulevardiers as being pretty good music for Indians. I also secured a French edition of it, and three months from the day I sat down to outdo old Beethoven I had cleared $50,000. I had outdone him.

"It goes to show what advertising will do," concluded Tom as he rose from his chair and cleared his throat.

But his auditors did not seem satisfied. "You're not through," said the actor. "What became of the sad-eyed composer?"

Chandler sat down in his chair again and cast his eye around the expectant ones.

"Well, honest," said he, "I attempted to make him accept half of the money but he wouldn't hear of it. And what's more, he wouldn't allow me to advertise his own music as being by the author of the other thing. He acted a good deal like an ass, I thought. He said, 'I must be true to my feelings, Mr. Chandler. Money is a nice thing to have and I wish I could make such a sum by my music, but I would debase my art if I allowed myself to be advertised through such a song as that. You paid me liberally for my hack work and that ends it.'"

"And did that end it?" persisted the actor.

"You bet it didn't. I happened to have a little house up near New Rochelle that was without a tenant. I told Theodore that if he didn't want to make me his enemy for life that he'd have to be its caretaker, and he finally accepted. But that was a good deal to make out of a single song, wasn't it?"

"Chandler, why don't you finish your story," asked the clergyman, who was a next-door neighbor of the advertising man and knew him intimately.

"No more to tell," said Chandler.

"Nonsense," said the clergyman. "You haven't any idea of an artistic finish. Well, then, I'll tell it."

All eyes were now turned on the clergyman and he went on: "When the little composer moved up to the cottage at New Rochelle he found that among the furniture was a grand piano and a music cabinet for his manuscripts.

"And the Parisian house recognized the musical worth in the harmonization of the song and asked Mr. Chandler if they might see more of his work, and he sent in one of Theodore's sonatas for piano and violin, and it was immediately published and performed at one of the Colonne concerts. And of course the Parisian cachet gave Theodore a start in America and the publishers tumbled over each other to get hold of his work."

"Yes, but that's Theodore's story; that's not my story," said Tom.

"Well, the whole thing sounds like a fairy story," said the actor, "one of the too-good-to-be-true kind."

"But it is true," said Tom; "every word of it except the name of the publishing firm. But what jars me is that I've never had another inspiration."

"snuggled." Coming, as she did, of a very old family which dated back to 1860, she felt a certain degree of commiseration for brand-new people like the Baldwins, who had not appeared above the social horizon until 1880—twenty years later. But she really liked them, and with a diplomatic instinct inherited from her father she relieved the situation by rising and saying:

"I see dear Mrs. Baldwin on the balcony and must go and speak to her."

And as she flitted through the glass door a deep masculine voice just behind Eleanor said:

"Good-morning, Miss Baldwin."

It was the Honorable Edward George Francis Castlestuart-Stuart, third secretary of the British Embassy, whom Eleanor had asked to breakfast that morning. She grew pale as she rose to greet him—suppose—suppose he had heard that remark about the shoe-stitching machine? And what was more likely? The shoe-stitching machine was the family skeleton, and was usually kept under lock and key. By some occult and malign impulse her father had hauled it out and rattled it in Mrs. Hill-Smith's face, and perhaps it might be known at the British Embassy!

Baldwin himself realized the impropriety of his conduct, and tried to rectify it by saying, with great cordiality, to the Honorable Mr. Castlestuart-Stuart:

"Good-morning—good-morning. Very pleased to see you. You find me, as usual, among my books—my best and oldest friends."

To this Castlestuart-Stuart replied simply, like the honest Briton that he was:

"I hate books."

Baldwin was nearly paralyzed at this, and still more so when the honest Briton quite eagerly went out on the balcony to speak to Mrs. Baldwin. Only the day before in one of his rambles about town he had come upon her getting out of a cab before a poor lodging-house in Southeast Washington, her arms loaded with bundles. A swarm of poor children had run forward to greet her—they evidently knew her well. Her usually cold, statuesque face had been warmed with the sweet light of charity, and a heavenly joy shone in her eyes in the process of feeding the hungry and visiting the sick.

As Castlestuart-Stuart went out on the balcony and took Mrs. Baldwin's hand cordially she blushed—but not painfully. She, too, had seen him yesterday, and he had managed to convey with that peculiar art of a simple and candid nature that he admired her for what she was doing. Again did she feel this sincere and admiring approval—and was profoundly grateful for it. Castlestuart-Stuart knew perfectly well the history of the family—all the diplomats in Washington know the family history of those who race and chase after them. He remembered hearing Constance Maitland say that "Mrs. Baldwin redeems the whole family." Goodness such as hers could redeem much worse people than the Baldwins, thought Castlestuart-Stuart, and he proceeded to be bored by Mrs. Hill-Smith and Eleanor with the best grace in the world. His chief had told him to take what was set before him in a social way, asking no questions for conscience' sake. In the performance of his duty he had dined, breakfasted and lunched with pork, dry goods, whisky, shoes, sewing machines, and every other form of good, honest trade. But the word trade was never so much as mentioned among its beneficiaries—certainly not at the breakfast which was now served.

LITERARY FOLK
Their Ways & Their Work

THE ILLUSTRATOR — He is the newspaper man of painting, and often he suffers from bad assignments.

¶ The relation of the illustrator to his text has always been a painful subject. It is admittedly impossible to publish a popular magazine without illustrations, and yet there remains a very large class of readers who judge the likelihood of disappointment in any illustration to be so much greater than the chance of added pleasure that they prefer plain print and their own unaided fancy to very excellent black and whites, and very intricate and more or less successful color work, which conflict with their own and, so they believe, the author's ideals.

The author's complaint is that his illustrators are preoccupied with problems which in no way touch his mood or intent — that they see nothing in him but a chance to pose smart young women and sleek young men in attitudes of frozen boredom, or to elaborate structures of technique and composition which may be wholly meritorious in themselves, but which, as examples of illustration, of insight and interpretation, are in no less degree, but only in differing quality, as childish as his friends of the fashion plates. Stevenson has one of his happy phrasings for this protest:

"Such numbers of people can do good black and whites, so few can illustrate a story, or apparently read it . . . the great affair is that you" (he was writing to Gordon Browne) "have been to the pains to illustrate my story instead of making conscientious black and whites of people sitting talking."

The illustrator in turn is constantly bewailing the restricted intelligence of authors who, with obstinate disregard of the limitations of all painting and in narrow ignorance of the painter's aim and method, insist on illustrations which are more like explanatory diagrams of the action or printed directions to the reader. The illustrator's profession is no easy one. He is the newspaper man of painting. It is his business to cover murders and merrymakings, weddings and wakes — and to cover them all well. He stands to the world of letters in the same relation that the reporter stands to the world of news. Each has his fact, and between the man and the fact stands for one the managing editor, for the other the art editor — retail dispensers, as it were, of destiny, with an eye to the market and the visible supply. In the mad scramble for copy the reporter does not always get his right assignment. Just as the exigencies of the moment sometimes bring him his chance — the personified entity for which every new man is waiting — so in the revolution of the wheel they bring him his failure, his "fall down" he would call it: or if he sees with equal eye the varying face of Fortune in all her contradictory moods, that is but the other way for saying that he sees all indifferently.

So with the illustrator. To take a present instance, Mr. Peter Newell, in his illustrations of Mrs. Freeman's The Wind in the Rose-Bush, is suffering from a bad assignment. The art editor is supposed to see to these things. It is his business as retail dispenser to fulfill the publisher's standing prescription of the right man for the right work — but if Lake is busy Gamboge has to take it; and Gamboge, you may be sure, will take it whether he likes it or not, because his connection with his publisher is not a thing to be severed by such slender excuses as preferences, for the publisher also has his preferences. The art editor has his. Between them they settle their differences and little of their quarrel is heard in the land; but what, in the arbitrament of the event, appears clearly enough is that the agreement reached is often based on faulty reasoning.

THE WIND IN THE ROSE-BUSH — Mrs. Freeman's book of ghost stories is hurt by inadequate illustration.

¶ Because Mr. Newell has excelled where he had full freedom for his own admitted and individual talent it does not follow that he will excell in a field where it is the author who has full freedom — in, say, Mrs. Freeman's ghost stories, the case in hand. Mrs. Freeman's manner is by this time pretty well known to her readers and should be to her publishers. She is sparing in her use of adjectives; her work is chiseled, not colored; she touches only the familiar, the well-worn detail, but she touches it in a way and at a moment to make it glow from the inside with a dramatic intensity which does not need, which would not bear, a more elaborate and ornate treatment. When she comes to these stories of the supernatural it is again the familiar, the long known, commonplace furniture and accidents of housekeeping which change, with ever so slight a shifting, into the sinister, malignant expressions of foreboding and ill-will — a pot which does not smell of what can be seen seething inside, a mirror which does not give back the face that looks into it, a rose-bush which rustles when there is no wind. The artist who is to get the horror out of these mutations — all the more horrid that they are wrought out of every-day life — must supply all that Mrs. Freeman leaves out. It is for him to be fluent with light, and portentous with the uncertainty of shadow, to be explicit where the author is suggestive, and suggestive where the author is explicit. And above all, in treating an author who works with such repression, who is so intent on each detail, he should always, as Stevenson recommended, read his story. The Miss Flint of The Wind in the Rose-Bush is described as a "very large and handsome woman, . . . placid, pink and dimpled, . . . a great, handsome blonde creature." It would be difficult to recognize her in the frontispiece, where she appears large in the sense of being fat — dumpy, dowdy, rather worn, and sour-visaged. Luella Miller in the story of the same name has been a "beauty" with a "long, lovely face" and "a wonderful grace of motion and attitude." "If one of them willows over there on the edge of the brook," says one of the characters who had known her, "could start up, and get its roots free of the ground, and move off, it would go just the way Luella Miller used to." Luella of the picture is hollow-cheeked, thin, pathetic, dank. In the story called The Vacant Lot particular stress is laid on the fact that Mrs. Townsend is "small," physically small. There is a prodigious crash in the house and every mirror from the basement to the attic is shivered with the shock. Mr. Townsend rushes in and asks his wife if she had a fall. The question has an absurd, puzzled impossibility about it, born of the man's blind terror, but all inconsequentiality vanishes in the illustration, where it becomes perfectly evident that Mrs. Townsend, had she fallen, would have shivered not only all the mirrors but the very ribs and rafters of the house itself in her descent through successive ceilings to the cellar.

The truth is, Mr. Newell does better where he works at his own bidding; the two best illustrations in The Wind in the Rose-Bush are the two farthest removed from the limitations of the text. His work is too pronounced in its own characteristics to lend itself readily to the promptings of another talent.

THE SEARCH FOR A TITLE — The plight of a man confused and hopelessly lost in a forest of signboards.

¶ Now, if some one with Mark Twain's humor and Henry James' subtleties of psychology would record an author's search for a title, benighted, lost in the familiar surroundings of his own creation, he might become immortal at a bound. It is not only difficult to find a good title, but it is often nearly impossible to find a fitting title that has not been used before. The Shakespeare and Biblical concordances, dictionaries of familiar phrases and quotations, and the cumulative indexes of one sort and another have grown dog-eared and grimy in the search. Even then the possibility of mistake is not eliminated. We notice among current books Before the Dawn, by Joseph A. Altsheler (Doubleday Page & Co.). Perhaps it may be remembered that Houghton, Mifflin & Co. published a Before the Dawn, by Pimenoff-Noble, in 1901. And in one of Messrs. Harper Brothers' monthly publications for April is a short story entitled The Eternal Feminine — a much-worn phrase, to be sure, but one which happens to have been appropriated some time since by Mr. Israel Zangwill, who now publishes the short story to which he lent it in a volume called The Grey Wig, brought out this spring by the Macmillans.

Oddities & Novelties of Every-Day Science

SOME LONG-LIVED SEEDS — Many unexplained phenomena of germination are being looked into.

A STRANGE interment recently took place in a field adjacent to the National Cemetery at Arlington, Virginia. Caskets filled with the seeds of a great variety of plants and trees were lowered into the ground in many gravelike openings.

They were not planted. They were buried. A company of botanists, pathologists, agrostologists and other scientists presided over the unique and puzzling ceremonies.

Once every year one of these "graves" will be opened, a casket disinterred, its contents planted and the ensuing growth watched with scientific interest. Before the last seed casket is exhumed the experimenters who have inaugurated the tests will have long since passed away. In fact, the experiments are to continue for a century or more.

The purpose is to determine the duration of the germinative property of seeds. At present scientists are unable to tell how long seeds retain the life principle. On this topic puzzling requests for information come from various parts of the world.

It is reported that in soil carried into Western valleys by hydraulic operations in the mountains, trees of a variety previously unknown either in the mountains or the valley spring up. Where did the seeds come from? Had they lain dormant for years, or perhaps ages, in the earth? The supposition is that they are the survivals of former forests. The theory awakens speculation as to the vitality of seed life.

Often when sod land is broken for cultivation noxious weeds spring up which, so far as the farmer knows, never grew before in that locality. The theory is that the seed lay in the ground for generations, awaiting certain conditions necessary to cause it to germinate.

In a park in Paris a species of Lathyrus which had once been abundant disappeared on account of the growing shade of trees. Thirty years from the time of the plant's apparent extinction in that locality the trees were thinned and the leguminous vine reappeared. A more mysterious instance was that of plants of the rush genus (Juncus bufonius) making their appearance in earth obtained from a great depth in an excavation in Paris. In another section of France, on the banks of a ditch in a stretch of country reclaimed by drainage, alders suddenly began to grow broadcast. So far as human knowledge goes, that tree was never before known to exist in that or any neighboring locality. The supposition is that in some prehistoric period that part of the country was an alder forest, whose surviving seeds, after a lapse of ages, now reappear.

The information along these lines is vague and unsatisfactory. Similarly, the statement that wheat found in Egyptian sarcophagi grew readily when planted, 4000 or 5000 years from the time of harvesting, cannot be accepted as proved. Yet, in the absence of definite knowledge, experts reserve opinion. It is to supply exact data on the subject that the burial of seed has taken place at Arlington.

THE POISON-PROOF PRAIRIE DOG — Arsenic, corrosive sublimate and potassium cyanide he eats like oats.

THE use of a new and singularly powerful poison is redeeming millions of valuable Western acres. In Kansas alone, where the mixture has been thoroughly tested, its efficacy in exterminating destructive rodents, which until now have been poison-proof, will save over half a million dollars' worth of forage crops annually. Besides that, it assures the safeguarding of the horticultural interests of the State which have been seriously menaced.

Hitherto prairie dogs (Cynomys ludovicianus) and pocket gophers (Geomys bursarius) have wreaked widespread havoc in Kansas, all efforts to stay their ravages having proved inadequate. Arsenic, corrosive sublimate, barium carbonate, potassium cyanide and strychnine have been persistently administered, but the hardy and predatory rodents have survived this chemical diet. Efforts have been made to suffocate the pests by forcing sulphur fumes into the burrows, and to do it on a large scale machines were specially designed. It was also hoped to decimate the prairie-dog villages and gopher colonies by introducing contagious diseases. Notwithstanding all attempts it was found that they were on the increase. Until a few months ago prairie dogs held dominion in sixty-eight counties in Kansas, their depredations covering an area of 2,000,000 acres. Even on pasture land whose native-grass meadows offer more resistance than cultivated crops, the damage done by prairie dogs has been fifty per cent. Wheat and alfalfa fields have been frequently totally devoured by these pests, which figure in Cooper's novels somewhat more romantically as "prairie-marmots" and "wish-ton-wish." The total annual loss caused by the prairie dogs in Kansas has been not less than $80,000. Pocket gophers have been a still greater scourge. In some years they have destroyed one-tenth of the entire alfalfa crop of that State, representing a loss of over $500,000. In addition they have menaced the existence of orchards and nurseries, destroying thousands of trees by girdling them.

Finally, after years of fruitless efforts at extermination, a secret poison has been concocted which gives promise of ridding Kansas entirely of the animals. Quantities of the poison are sent, upon application, to farmers throughout the State, but the formula is withheld from the public. The operation of mixing the poison is exceedingly dangerous and is conducted under the personal supervision of State chemists. Thus far the subtle and powerful compound has absolutely exterminated prairie dogs on more than a quarter of a million acres, and the demand for the poison is taxing the State's facilities for its manufacture. So potent is the mixture that a half-gallon can of it has destroyed the inhabitants of 1200 burrows, which comprised a prairie-dog village covering 160 acres.

That this discovery of an effective poison for the rodents marks an important chapter in the development of the State will be realized when it is known that the question had assumed such importance that the Legislature of Kansas at the last session passed a formal law declaring war on the animals and making appropriation for the campaign. Under the provisions of this enactment the authorities have been enabled to test the new poison extensively.

State officials conducted the initial experiments. Within twenty-four hours from the beginning of operations every prairie dog on an eighty-acre tract had been killed by the poison. Now the slaughter is growing into a general crusade, the officials and farmers working in zealous coöperation to rid Kansas entirely of these active enemies of husbandry.

POWDERED MILK — It will be put up in tins and will be available for use on shipboard, in the woods and elsewhere.

CHEMISTS in the Department of Agriculture are interesting themselves in a new discovery which promises to be of much importance to the public in general and more particularly to dairy farmers.

The subject under their consideration is the manufacture of flour from milk.

They say that an apparatus has been perfected by which milk can be reduced to a powder having all the appearance of ordinary wheat flour and possessing the food qualities of milk.

The process which precipitates the milk into flour produces a commodity which is not sensitive to heat and other conditions which vitally affect milk in its natural state.

The cost of production of this nonfermentable milk flour will be, it is estimated, about twenty-five cents a hundred quarts, and flour made from skimmed milk will probably be sold at twelve and one-half cents a pound.

Hitherto skimmed milk has not been a very profitable dairy product, not infrequently going to waste altogether. Converted into flour it will assume a new economic importance.

The secret of the manufacture of this milk flour has not yet been made public, but samples of the novel product have been submitted to analytical chemists, who have pronounced favorable judgment upon it. Milk flour is said to be an altogether different product from any of the milk proteids now on the market. No rennet, acid or lye is used in the manufacture of milk flour.

The new product will be shipped in tins, bags and barrels.

How Men make FORTUNES

By

Orva S. Duff

In the last issue of "The Saturday Evening Post" appeared one of the largest display advertisements this publication ever printed—two full pages devoted to a subject which for the first time in the history of World Fairs is now being promulgated by the St. Louis Exposition.

A RECENT discussion by the executive board of the St. Louis World's Fair on the subject of Advertisement-writing, in their decision to set aside space for a "Department of Publicity," which is in itself an innovation in the history of World Fair propositions has awakened considerable interest. It is indeed surprising to note that so few people realize the important part advertising has played in the success of men. Fortunes are spent and fortunes are made. The profession of advertising is comparatively new, however, and offers innumerable opportunities to those who are trained in its details and have become qualified.

Hundreds of millions of dollars are spent yearly to promote a marketable article, and one needs but to look about him to see evidence of its potent power. There is more money spent in advertising than in the commerce of the world. The accumulated sum of a year's expenditure would double the United States surplus. The magnitude of this amount can be estimated when we say:

Place each copy of the advertisements appearing in all of the publications during one year end to end, and there would be an announcement ribbon over a hundred thousand miles long—assuming 250 clipped advertisements would make the thickness of an inch, placed sheet upon sheet they would erect a pile over a hundred million feet high. So essential is the proper handling of the appropriations and the proper construction of the advertisements appearing in the papers and other media of publicity, that it has become a science—a profession, followed by young men who are fortunate enough to have been thrown into that sphere.

Yet with this vast interest there are fewer men actively engaged in the preparation of advertisements than there are in any other field of honorable endeavor, where one-third the capital is represented.

This is doubtless due to the undeveloped comprehension of the profession and the man whose perceptive facilities are awake to the existing conditions is asking: "What advantage does this profession offer to the young man of to-day?" This question was recently advanced to ten young men who have studied the profession and are now engaged in active service, and the opinion of each is herewith given:

"The knowledge of advertising immediately places a man in his proper sphere and frees him from devoting many of the best years in his life 'working his way up.'" —Pierson H. Peck.

"It furnishes the training necessary to complete a man's mercantile education." —Victor W. Gates.

"It qualifies a man to successfully engage in the business with a small capital." —Milford B. Martin.

"It will fit a man to accept a previously proffered position." —A. F. Kohn.

"It will help a man out of a mediocre vocation." —Russell B. LaFontaine.

"It perfects a man who was previously handicapped by a limited knowledge of the advertising business." —W. A. Webster.

"It will make your services more valuable by letting your knowledge be known to your employer." —F. K. Johnston.

"It does away with that fear of losing a position, inasmuch as your services are always in demand." —A. F. Ryan.

"It affords an opportunity to create a new field of usefulness." —E. K. Holloway.

"It broadens a man's intellect and increases the horizon of his knowledge." —Lester Taylor.

No less an authority than Forrest Crissey says:

"Advertising is the great Expansion Agent of modern enterprise; the writing of advertisements is a science which joins the hands of COMMERCE and ART in a union giving to industry a progeny of prosperity beyond the dreams of yesterday. A few years since it was the science of amateurs, the idle hour job of cheap talent. Although this art is in its youth, the ranks of its experts contain a considerable number of men who receive salaries of ten thousand dollars and upwards; many who are paid above five thousand dollars, and hundreds who earn a yearly income of several thousand dollars. These are not fancy figures; the business world is looking for more opportunities to pay these and greater salaries to competent men. Every science, in its inception, was a haphazard way of doing certain things by those who 'had the knack.' And these generally declared that theirs was a gift of the Gods that came by birth and not by training. So it was with the science of advertising—until certain men of analytical mind came along and saw the clearly defined principles that were at the bottom of this, as of all other sciences; that its practice could be taught, and taught successfully—to those having even a moderate amount of common-sense and the faculty."

In the archives of the Page-Davis Co. (the institution to whom credit must be given for placing the profession upon a firm foundation), is found the records of men and women trained to manage departments of advertisement-writing, and who receive salaries ranging from $25.00 to $125.00 per week. Their testimonials show instances without number of thousands who have wisely taken up the study of advertising with that institution, and in a comparatively short time have made rapid advancement with correspondingly large salaries.

If the readers of THE SATURDAY EVENING POST will write to the Original Correspondence School of Advertising, Page-Davis Co., Suite 618, No. 90 Wabash Avenue, Chicago, they will receive free, an interesting prospectus setting forth the advantages of the advertising education—a most profitable, enlightening and fascinating business for ambitious men and women.

The Reading Table

Mark Twain as a Statesman

SENATOR STEWART, of Nevada, tells a new story of Mark Twain's apprenticeship. The humorist who was to make the world laugh was then employed as a reporter in Carson City, and was on duty one evening in the City Council when the session was presided over by a municipal statesman of exceedingly pompous manner, who cherished no great fondness for the young Clemens. This councilman, ordinarily of no intellectual resource, became hopelessly confused in a parliamentary tangle. Finally a motion was made to expunge from the records a certain matter which the presiding officer was extremely anxious should not become part of local history. The motion, having been seconded, was eagerly passed.

"The matter has been ordered expunged," declared the presiding councilman gravely, "and the clerk will proceed—to expunge. It should be effectively wiped out, obliterated and totally destroyed." He paused to notice the effect of his sentence of annihilation. "Where, gentlemen," he asked, "will you have the expunged matter deposited and placed?"

Mark Twain caught the attention of the councilman nearest him. "Let the expunged matter be worn under the Chairman's hat," he suggested; "no one would ever think of looking there for anything."

A Defense of Hunters

DR. A. K. FISHER, of the United States Biological Survey, is not only a profound student of natural history in general and birds in particular, but is also a great hunter for the sport of it. Like John Burroughs, who has often accompanied him on his expeditions, which have ranged from the Gulf of Mexico to the Arctic, Doctor Fisher has a poet's regard for the specimens he studies.

A few days ago with a fellow-scholar he was discussing the ethics of shooting birds. "How," he was asked, "can you reconcile your delight in killing birds with your unmistakable love for them as a scientist?"

"Song birds, insectivorous and plume birds," replied the naturalist, "are of inestimable value to the country, both economically and æsthetically, and should not be killed, save to a very limited extent for scientific purposes. I have no hesitancy, however, about shooting game birds in open season. The sport should be vigilantly controlled by intelligent legislation, but all efforts absolutely to prohibit the bagging of game birds, except in the case of diminishing species, are misdirected.

"And when the time comes," added the naturalist, "that the men of America no longer have the spirit to reach for their guns in the open season and go tramping the plains and mountains in search of game—when that condition overtakes us, any old nation will be able to step in and take the government off our hands."

By Another Name

A FEW evenings ago Secretary Cortelyou was enjoying a stroll in Lincoln Park which happens to be not far from his home on Capitol Hill. In front of a bronze statue of Lincoln which adorns this square Mr. Cortelyou noticed two colored women, one of whom, as evidenced by her dress, was from the country and taking in the sights of Washington with a city relative.

"And you can't guess who dat is?" the Washington woman was repeating, pointing to the statue of the Emancipator.

"I don't guess I can," was the response of the visitor. "Who is it?"

"Why, chile," said the ebony guide proudly, "dat am de instigator ob our renown."

Practical SYSTEM in BUSINESS

The business systems of twenty years ago did not change to those of today in a single jump. They were evolved day by day. . . . Tonight some restless inventor will lie awake devising something that will be useful to you tomorrow. . . . Continuous business success depends upon the substitution of today's methods for those of yesterday—of tomorrow's methods for those of today. . . . This page describes some of the devices which are necessary to the successful business man of today. READ THIS PAGE CAREFULLY.

Every man who conducts correspondence is interested in the question "Which is the best typewriter?" There are twenty-five substantial reasons why the OLIVER TYPEWRITER is the best machine the world has produced. So phenomenally successful has this machine become that it has proven its unqualified right to the title, "The Standard Visible Writer," and the business world has decided that its adoption increases quantity, improves quality and reduces expense. Strong claims—but easily proven. The wide range of the Oliver Typewriter's usefulness makes it easy to adopt systems heretofore impracticable except with the pen. Catalog 2 explains in detail.

The ADDRESSOGRAPH is as necessary to a modern office as steam is to an engine. With it an office boy can do in one hour what it formerly took ten clerks two hours to do. It not only addresses envelopes in exact imitation of typewriting, but also fills in names on duplicate letters, prints names and addresses on shipping tags, pay envelopes, time tickets, monthly statements and loose leaf systems. Thousands of business houses now have their lists of names arranged for the Addressograph and kept by States or Territories so that printed matter can be speedily sent to any special list. There is at least one place in your business for the Addressograph. Learn now what it will do. Catalog 7 describes it, and illustrates its many uses. Write for it to-day.

Modern business methods presuppose a convenient and orderly arrangement of papers. By the most approved system all orders, forms and records are spread on punched loose sheets, which are filed and classified according to the varying needs of each business. While in active use these loose sheets are kept in Holders if there be few, and in Binders if there be many; and when old the sheets are consecutively filed away in Transfer Binders as permanent records. The TATUM HOLDERS and BINDERS comprise 3 styles and 78 stock sizes. With them any one can easily start and maintain a loose-sheet system. These and other office devices are described in our printed matter. Ask for Catalog No. 16.

No office is considered complete without an EDISON MIMEOGRAPH. In these days of commercial competition there is no surer, quicker or cheaper way of quickening business than by employing the many means offered by this valuable machine. There is a place in almost any business where an Edison Mimeograph will save time and money. Perhaps you see no use for it in your office. You probably will after you read Catalog 6 and understand what a Mimeograph will do. It will pay you well to read it. Simply cut out and sign the coupon on the corner of this advertisement, or better still write us a letter stating your business, and we can suggest methods to meet your requirements.

Time is money. This is particularly true in the commercial world. BAIRD'S No. 12 TIME STAMP makes an absolutely accurate record for every purpose where time counts. The receipt of correspondence, job time, the arrival and departure of employees and in countless other cases time is measured to the minute by this—the only durable time stamp. It is made of the finest materials, with finely polished steel bearings. The clock movement, being in an entirely separate compartment from the stamping mechanism, is unaffected by the hammer action. The price is remarkably low. Catalog 3 describes and illustrates the Baird Time Stamp.

For many years methods of accounting did not change materially, but when the BURROUGHS ADDING MACHINE was placed on the market this branch of office work was revolutionized. To-day there are 12,500 of these great time savers in banks, mercantile houses, factories, wholesale and retail stores, etc. Wherever this machine is not part of an office equipment it is because its merits are not understood. The Burroughs Adding Machine bears the same relation to figures that the typewriter does to correspondence. It adds figures with ten times the speed of the quickest clerk and it is mechanically impossible for it to make a mistake. Described in Catalog 13. Write for it.

File your clippings, memoranda, and manuscript. Every busy man—literary, business or professional—realizes the great necessity of properly filing and classifying memoranda, clippings, data, etc.

Any one who has spent time searching through a mass of papers for a paragraph once marked, a misplaced clipping or memorandum, will appreciate the tremendous advantage of having such data arranged in order and at his fingers' ends.

The LIBRARY FILING CABINET is the solution of the problem of classification. It is the acme of simplicity and ready reference. Send to-day for Catalog 8. It gives valuable information that cannot be acquired from any other source.

No matter what you want to file—information, papers, samples, documents—there is a Shaw-Walker way to do it. And that way is the best way because it is the most simple. Shaw-Walker card systems are better than books—Shaw-Walker vertical letter files better than flat sheet cabinets—Shaw-Walker sectional bookcases better than solid ones. All are built in sections so they will grow as your business grows. Send to-day for Catalog 19. It tells all about SHAW-WALKER SYSTEMS. The book is concise, terse, yet complete. Costs the Shaw-Walker Company 38c. to send it, but they will do so gladly if you simply sign the coupon on the corner of this advertisement.

Old fashioned bound books for accounts are impractical and expensive. Loose leaf books allow of arrangement, rearrangement and expansion. They save time, for the yearly or semi-yearly opening of new books is done away with. They are self indexing. No outside index is required. The JONES PERPETUAL LEDGER COMPANY'S LOOSE LEAF BOOKS have every advantage of any loose leaf book and more—absolute alignment of the leaves—a strong binder in which the leaves cannot move a hair's breadth. Every progressive business man should read Catalog 1. It explains JONES PERPETUAL LEDGER COMPANY'S LOOSE LEAF BOOKS and how you can use them in your business. And there isn't a mercantile house in the country where they cannot be used to advantage.

Some business men are prejudiced against fountain pens. And that same prejudice has kept them from knowing how great a saving WATERMAN'S IDEAL FOUNTAIN PENS would make in their office work. Continuous writing without dipping and blotting saves so much of a man's own time—and the time of his stenographers and clerks—that a pen pays for itself in a short time. But the fountain pen must be a "Waterman," else the bother and leaks and breaks might offset the saving. Catalog 5 tells all about Waterman's Ideal Fountain Pens, and of special pens made for modern office work. Write for catalog. If you are specially interested in manifold work, tell us.

The PROTECTOGRAPH will absolutely secure the integrity of your checks. It impresses a line like this:

in strictly indelible ink upon any preferred part of the check so deeply as to make the line a part of the document itself and absolutely unalterable and ineffaceable. It is used by the U. S. Treasury and more than 10,000 financial and industrial institutions. The machine is a model of mechanical beauty, simplicity and efficiency. Write for Catalog 15 which tells some things about check raising and check protection that you may not know. A postal card will bring it.

The little things in an office sometimes save the most time, labor and money. RUBBER STAMPS, NUMBERING MACHINES, ETC., suited to your business, will aid you in a countless number of ways, and at little cost considering the valuable service they can render. There is system in using stamps, too, that you ought to know about. An ingenious little holder called "Rex" keeps them in order, clean and handy. The best ideas on Rubber Stamps and kindred articles are described in Catalog 12. New ideas for Rubber Stamps are being discovered almost daily. If you send for this catalog you will receive not only the latest and most practical ideas discovered up to date, but will be kept informed of new schemes that are being constantly originated in the leading mercantile houses.

AN ERICSSON INTERIOR TELEPHONE SYSTEM shortens office work, saves actual time, saves confusion. To some men such a system seems a luxury. All who have installed the system know it is an economy. Cheap interior 'phones soon get out of order. That's worse than no system at all. But the Ericsson is built to last—the same quality and style used on long distance lines. No other concern anywhere has studied the telephone system so thoroughly, or devised so many special instruments and attachments to save time and bother in office communication. The Ericsson system contains all the best features of other 'phones and some features found in no other 'phones. Ask now for Catalog 4.

There was a time when any old chair would do for the office. Business and comfort were not partners. But times have changed and ideas of business comfort have changed with them. MCCLOUD'S NEW TWENTIETH CENTURY ADJUSTABLE SPRING BACK CHAIRS have been important factors in the improvement. "Back Resters" they call them—because they give complete back rest while at work, thereby enabling the man at the desk or woman at the typewriter to accomplish more work with greater comfort. Catalog 14 describes the McCloud Chairs and shows the adjustment which fits the back.

To save time and labor, to insure neatness and accuracy, to facilitate work, use the THEXTON ELECTRIC ENVELOPE SEALER. It is practical, durable and simple. Endorsed by over 1,000 concerns as a paying and profitable investment. It performs the labor of several people, requires no attention, is always ready for instant use. So simple any boy or girl can use it and feed envelopes at a minimum speed of 100 per minute. It is being used by the largest trust companies, banks, commercial and mail-order houses in the country, who have installed it after thorough and practical tests, and found to fulfill every claim made. Sent out on free trial to sell strictly upon merit. Ask now for Catalog 11, with list of users.

Farmers Who Advertise

By David Buffum

AMONG the advocates of "modern" or "improved" farming there is often a noticeable tendency to treat agriculture as an exact science rather than a business. This is a mistake. It is true that accurate scientific knowledge plays an important part in farming; indeed, without it the highest success in agriculture is impossible of attainment. But good farming, as I have pointed out in a former article, is a business, and, as such, the application of established business principles is essential to its every department. It is my purpose here to speak of a department so important as to demand always the most careful consideration. I mean the marketing of the output.

There is no question but that the aggregate loss to farmers from selling their goods in a poor market is very great. In a certain New England watering-place, for instance, I have known eggs, before the advent of the summer visitors, to be almost a drug on the market; while at another city, only thirty miles distant, they were in brisk demand at ten cents more on the dozen. This is a great difference in price and was far more than the extra cost of transportation, which could hardly have exceeded one cent on the dozen. And yet very few farmers took advantage of the situation, the inertia of long-settled habit keeping most of them in their accustomed channel of trade.

I also recall an instance in my own farming, when I had a lot of turkeys to dispose of, as I hoped, at a fancy price. I sent one wagon load to a wealthy residence town and another to a manufacturing city, the two men in charge being about equally expert as salesmen. The lot sold in the manufacturing city brought twenty cents a pound (two cents above the price current of best turkeys), while the lot sold in the residence town brought twenty-five cents and sold quicker. The manufacturing city was much the larger place of the two, but it had not the class of people who were willing to pay outside prices.

It is argued that many farmers are unable to pick and choose their environment and that force of circumstance constrains them to make use of such markets as lie near at hand, the cost of transportation being too great to warrant sending goods to a better one. This argument is rarely tenable, unless the output is inconsiderable in quantity. Farms do not lie very extensively in cities, and even if suburban land were within the means of the farmer, the tolls and interest upon it would generally far more than offset its advantages. The cost of transportation must assuredly be considered, but it is seldom such a drawback as is commonly supposed.

I had, a few years ago, a stallion that I bought for my own use and that of my neighbors, but the latter made little use of him and his earnings in the stud rarely exceeded three hundred dollars a year. The trouble was that though I was myself a breeder of horses, the great majority of my neighbors were not. Meanwhile I had procured another stallion that I liked better and I decided on a change for the first one.

In one of the Western States was a locality where raising horses was the principal business of the farmers, but where I knew there was no stock-horse equal to mine, and to that locality I determined to take him. I recall vividly the look of amazement on the face of one of my neighbors when I told him of my decision. "Why!" he gasped, "yuw must be crazy. It must be nigh on to a thousan' mile to that 'ere section o' country." I told him it was certainly all of that. "What'll it cost to take the hoss there?" he asked. "About thirty dollars," I replied; "then, say, forty more for hotel bills, etc., while I'm getting him placed in the hands of some reliable man, and thirty to return—about a hundred dollars in all, in round numbers." He gave a long, low whistle. "Whe-e-ew! An' yuw expect a job to pay that's attended with such blame inordinate expense as that? Well, I'm dum'd!"

The program was carried out. The first season that the horse stood in the West he earned me $650, the second $925, and the third $825. I then sold him for a far larger price than I could have realized had his only record in the stud been the one that he made in the East.

Another instance that comes to my mind of advantageously seeking a good market,

SAVE HALF YOUR CIGAR MONEY AND GET A BETTER SMOKE

Our proposition is a simple one. We save you 50 per cent. of ordinary retail cigar prices, not by price cutting, but by cutting out the profits and expenses of the Jobbers, Salesmen and Retailers who successfully sold the output of our factory for years, and who each made a profit out of you, not out of us. We are now selling exclusively to the smoker direct by the box the same identical time-tested, popular brands of cigars that we formerly made for the wholesale trade in case lots, at precisely the same factory prices we formerly charged jobbers, shipping your choice of these same brands

Direct from Our Factory to You

All charges prepaid. We get the same profit, you get the same cigars; you also get the profits of the other fellows. Every box, and each cigar in every box, is covered by our perpetual guarantee to suit you, or to replace the cigars with others until you are suited, or to

CHEERFULLY REFUND YOUR MONEY

We have a simple method of finding and suiting your individual taste—as easy as going through a retailer's show case. For 75c. we will send a trial package of twelve regular 10c. and two-for-a-quarter cigars; for 50c. twelve 5c. and 10c. values. Each cigar separately wrapped and described. Write for our FREE illustrated booklet, ROLLED HEYERIES, showing how two-for-a-quarter and 10c. cigars can be bought in boxes of 25 and 50 for from 4c. to 6c. each; others from 2c. to 3c. Transportation always prepaid anywhere you say. Do not delay; you will always be glad you made the trial.

IN YOUR HOME

This very day you need the Angle Lamp. You need it because it is more brilliant and more economical and because it is easier to handle than the light you use now, no matter what it is. If you could conceive of the beauty and grandeur of its light, its simplicity and the entire absence of the various faults that cause dissatisfaction in other systems, you would marvel at yourself for having been without it so long. The comparatively little heat given by the Angle Lamp makes it a luxury during the warm weather. It is handled like gas, being lighted and extinguished in exactly the same way, can be left turned low in the room for any length of time without odor or any danger of explosion and burns but 10 cts. worth of oil a month. LAZY COFFEE

Another Name for the "Sloppy" Sort

Postum Coffee is not made like ordinary coffee for it takes at least 25 minutes' cooking to bring out the heavy food value of Postum. It requires some effort for those things which are really worth while—making Postum requires a little care.

The grocer is in a position to hear of those lazy ones who will not take the trouble to make Postum correctly. "I am well acquainted indeed with Postum," says a grocer of Camden, N. J., "for I meet it not only at my breakfast table but I am also associated with it daily in my business.

"Coffee drinking used to affect my nerves and stomach but since we have been using Postum in our family in place of coffee the bloated feeling after eating has disappeared and my head is now clear and stomach and nerves all right. We all feel better in every way and find Postum just as satisfactory to our palates.

"I have met customers who complained that Postum was not good but we always found this due to the fact that they tried to make it as they used to make coffee. Of course we set them right by pointing out the reasons, telling them they must boil Postum 15 or 20 minutes after boiling commences, then they get fine, choice and delicious Postum." Name furnished by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

regardless of a considerable distance, is that of a New England farmer whom I know well. He lives in a very fertile reach of country, but his farm is fifteen miles from the nearest railroad station, and from there fifteen more to the city. Most of his neighbors "trade" at the country store, but this farmer goes twice a week to the city, taking with him large quantities of butter, eggs, poultry, fruit and farm produce. In the city he hires two wagons, one to deliver the wholesale orders, and the other for the family trade. It is needless to say that he pays more for these teams than he would for the same accommodation in his native town, and one of his neighbors, reflecting on this "blame inordinate expense," observed that "payin' out what that crazy cuss does in car fares and for teams in the city, he didn't see how he ever made his dum'd business pay—and he didn't more'n half b'leeve it did pay, either." And yet the "crazy cuss" is to-day rated as one of the wealthiest men of his town, while his critic, though owning by inheritance a larger and better farm, is comparatively poor. It is right for me to add, however, that the latter is an acknowledged oracle in the country store, an accepted authority on all things, from points of theology to the digging of wells—to say nothing of his neighbors' affairs. It is not given to one man to compass all the heights of greatness, and personally I never knew a thrifty, prosperous farmer who was a country-store oracle.

I could cite other instances but I think I need not multiply examples to show the extreme importance to the farmer of placing his goods in the right market. Failure in this respect minimizes the result of the greatest economy and good management in others, and a bad market—or even a good one, poorly utilized—is often sufficient to wreck a farming enterprise otherwise conducted with the best of judgment.

How is a good market poorly utilized? By dumping into it cartloads of stuff to be sold by commission houses, thus losing not only the middleman's profit but sharing with the commission man a large part of the profit that properly belongs to the farmer himself; by letting gilt-edged fancy goods go along with the indifferent or poor to fetch what they may chance to bring; and last but not least, by sending inferior goods which bring so low a price as hardly to offset the cost of transportation. The competition in farm products of ordinary quality is tremendous, often running the price down to a very low figure. It is the superior goods that pay and that place the farmer on such a footing in the market that he can boldly state what he asks for them, instead of humbly inquiring of some third-class dealer what he will give. Be assured that in every large city there is a class of people who are willing to pay the very best of prices for farm products if they can only have the very best of goods.

This brings me to the proper means of reaching this class of customers and introduces another important factor in the marketing of goods: advertising, a thing as essential to the farmer as to any other business man. It is true that, having once got a foothold and established a reputation for his goods, he may need much less advertising than at the start; but it is doubtful whether he can afford to wholly dispense with it at any time. Advertising, in various ways, has long been practiced by one class of farmers—the stock-breeders; indeed we should hardly know how to get along without it. To my mind it is clear that it would very often be of just as much value in other branches; but custom—a strange thing, I have sometimes thought, in the powerful grip that it has on farmers—has long restricted advertising to stock-breeders alone.

Let me cite a few instances from my own experience of what judicious advertising will do.

Many years ago circumstances threw into my hands the care and management of a large dairy. The cows were of good quality, but the butter was no whit better than the average. It was marketed at the country store and in turn sent to the city by the storekeeper. It brought twenty cents a pound, which was the price current for "farmers' butter" at that time; and in honesty, that was all it was worth.

My first move was to call the attention of my butter maker to certain principles which, though simple and few in number, must invariably be observed if good butter is to be made. The result was that we soon began to turn out a very fancy article indeed. I now had a lot of sample half-pounds very nicely put up and sent among the people whom I wished to secure as customers, each package accompanied by a printed letter,

The Stone Method

This picture illustrates the muscular and chest development of one of our pupils, Mr. George Bosworth, of Beatrice, Nebr. Mr. Bosworth wrote us an interesting letter giving his opinion of The Stone Method. We will send you his letter if you desire it. The Stone Method is a system of exercise which requires no apparatus, and only 10 to 20 minutes' time each day, in your own room, just before retiring. Does not overtax the heart. Women receive as much benefit from The Stone Method as men. We are the only instructors of prominence who pay special attention to instruction of women and children. stating that I was prepared to send by express butter of this quality at thirty-five cents a pound to any one ordering ten pounds or more at a time. Smaller orders than this I did not care for, on account of the cost of expressage. In less than a month we had orders, at this price, for all that we could make; and from that time on the demand was greater than we could supply.

Much of this butter was sent nearly two hundred miles by rail and the remainder went to a city some thirty miles distant. In looking back now I feel certain that a larger price could have been obtained, but I was new to the business (having previously confined my live-stock operations almost wholly to horses and sheep), and I did not realize how very scarce the finest butter was—and still is—in the market. But seventy-five per cent. is nevertheless a great advance in price.

As I have intimated, the use of advertising does not need to be recommended to stock-breeders, but a certain live-stock transaction that I recall so aptly illustrates its general value that I think I may very properly relate it. I had a large flock of Southdown sheep to sell and I wished, if possible, to make a clean sweep of them and close out the whole flock at once. I therefore put an advertisement in a journal that had a large circulation among stock men, calling attention to the pedigrees and individual merits of the sheep, and stating that if the whole flock was taken a low figure would be named.

I do not think any of my immediate neighbors ever saw this journal, but through that bureau of general information, "the store," it became known that the sheep were for sale. One of my neighbors had long kept what he called Southdowns—that is, unregistered mongrels in which Southdown blood predominated—and this gentleman came to me and offered eight dollars a head for the flock, "and take the hull on 'em, good, bad and indifferent." Common sheep at that time were quoted in the stock-market reports at from two dollars and a half to four dollars a head.

I fancied that my neighbor turned pale while making this generous concession to the merits of blooded stock, and he apologized for his conduct by saying that he didn't know but he was a blame fool, but he wanted them sheep bad. I saved him from further folly by declining his offer. He told me that no one else in the neighborhood would give me any more, and he told the truth. But in this fancy-stock business I had never depended on the neighborhood for a market, and a few days later I sold the sheep to a distant flock owner for twenty dollars a head.

This, to be sure, was not a large price, individually, for Southdowns—though it was a very good one when it is remembered that it included the whole flock, some of which were aged, and some lambs running with their dams. I mention it, however, not to show that it was a large price, but to show the vast difference between it and what could have been realized without advertising.

"Advertisin' never created a customer!" said a country sage to me once. Perhaps it does not create customers—though I have known cases where this might be questioned—but it brings together the man who wants to sell and the man who wants to buy.

In speaking of the value of advertising to farmers, I would not, of course, be understood as advocating its indiscriminate or excessive use: it is simply one of the factors in the proper marketing of goods and, as such, is to be used with discriminating judgment. No hard and fast rules can be laid down, and it is for the farmer to decide when it is to his advantage to advertise and, what is of equal importance, what form of advertising will best serve his purpose. In the marketing of staple products, such as wheat, corn, hay, potatoes and the like, in which the price current for each grade is very definitely fixed, advertising would serve no purpose, and such crops, if produced in any considerable quantities, are best disposed of through the regular channels of trade.

The whole matter of marketing farm products resolves itself into what is necessary in any well-conducted enterprise: a careful study of the situation and the exercise of common-sense. I would say, in conclusion, what I have often said before when speaking of the possibilities of agriculture, that, as the demand for the best farm products is always in excess of the supply, he who has them has a great advantage in the market if only he knows how to profit by the situation. And if he has practiced a proper economy in their production and follows up with sagacity and perseverance the advantages that the market conditions afford, he need have no fear of the result; his reward will be ample.

Dentist to $100 Draftsman Through the I. C. S.

When I enrolled in the International Correspondence Schools, I had a good dental practice in Maxwell, Iowa, but my opportunities were limited, so I decided to become a draftsman. While the Schools were training me for this work, I made and sold mechanical drawings, receiving as high as $15 for a single drawing. Just one year after enrolling, through the help of the Schools' Students' Aid Department, I became chief draftsman for the Smith Metallic Packing Co., 861 Monadnock Bldg., Chicago, Ill. (for whom I had previously made some drawings), with a salary of $100 per month and expenses. Any one of average intelligence who follows the instruction can succeed.

PRETTY CHEEKS

A Food That Makes Girls Sweet to Look Upon

The right food for young ladies is of the greatest importance to their looks, to say nothing of the health. Thin, sallow girls don't get the right food you may be absolutely certain. A Brooklyn girl says: "For a long time in spite of all I could do I was thin, skinny and nervous. My cheeks were so sunken my friends used to remark on how bad I looked. I couldn't seem to get strength from my food — meat, potatoes, bread, &c. So I tried various medicines without help.

"I often read about Grape-Nuts, but never tried the food until one day something impressed me that perhaps if I would eat Grape-Nuts for my nerves and brain I could digest and get the good of my food. So I started in. The food with cream was fascinating to my taste and I went in for it regularly twice a day.

"Well I began to improve and now while on my third package I have changed so my friends congratulate me warmly, ask me what in the world I have taken, &c., &c. My cheeks are plump and rosy and I feel so strong and well. I sleep sound and it seems as though I couldn't get enough to eat. Thank you sincerely for making Grape-Nuts." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There's a reason for Grape-Nuts.

slender, dark man in a blue serge suit and negligé shirt, who mechanically adjusted his gold pince-nez as he advanced now at a slower gait. The two Chinamen with war bows fitted long arrows to the strings, and with a sudden lifting of the left foot and widening of the arms they let drive. One arrow whizzed by Hopper's head and the other pierced his clothing, making a nasty scratch on his left side. Then the pistol cracked twice and the two Chinamen fell sprawling, with bullets through their bodies. The other two promptly dropped the fainting women and started to run. Hopper aimed deliberately at the one who had seized the Princess and fired. It was a long shot, but the bullet took effect, as a scream of pain testified.

Neither the Princess nor the maid evinced any signs of reviving, but lay there huddled upon the ground as though dead. Hopper ran to the edge of the bluff and there, as good fortune would have it, was the General's lotka, and the General himself strolling along leisurely upon the sand. The American shouted so loudly and flung his arms about so wildly that the orderly, the two moujiks, and even the Governor himself were soon scrambling up the steep bank toward him. The Romanova had revived by the time they all reached her, and sat in the tall grass doing up her abundant hair, woman fashion, and looking about with awakening eyes. She was pale as a ghost and held out her hands appealingly. Hopper and the General helped her to her feet, and it was the American who supported her until her trembling limbs regained their strength. The General surveyed the dead Chinamen, and then, standing squarely in front of Hopper, removed his cap and made a low bow.

At the next station they found a small Government boat awaiting them that drew but one foot of water. It had been sent down by the authorities to pick up the Governor, and Courtland Hopper, ex-cotillon leader, was taken on board and given one of the four cabins all to himself, although one of the greatest heiresses in all Russia was thereby compelled to occupy a room with her maid. There was still a special apartment left for the Governor's dog.

During the remainder of the journey Hopper scarcely left the Princess' side. Indeed, she showed little desire that he should keep at a distance, for she greeted him every morning with a dazzling smile, and remained till all hours of the night with him upon the little deck, looking at the moon and the ghostly Cossack villages that now became more frequent. They could not talk to each other, but as often as he would make her understand by signs she would cry sweetly, "Da, da!" which means yes in Russian, and whenever he failed to catch her meaning she would murmur sadly, "Nicheevo," which signifies "Nothing at all," or "No."

They arrived at Stretinsk all too soon for the American, who deemed that he should never see the Princess again after bidding her good-by at the gangplank. He was more affected than he cared to show, but by making the interview brief he managed to get through it creditably. The lady pressed his hand lingeringly, and looked unutterable gratitude at him out of her now serious eyes, in which the tears trembled. Hopper bowed very low and kissed the little hand, then he turned resolutely away and walked off. As he was leaving the boat the maid gave him a letter, written in the Russian language and bearing the Romanova crest at the head of the page.

Hopper found the store by repeating the magic word "Emory, Emory," to an isvosjik, and there he was greeted by a young Russian who spoke considerable English. With this man's aid he set to work immediately, and was soon up to the neck in business, studying the demands of the trade, getting in new stock, writing letters, and attending to a thousand and one details. Every spare moment he devoted to the study of Russian, and within two weeks knew enough words to render him less helpless. Meanwhile he carried the Princess' letter in his pocket, and every day he looked at it to see whether or not he could as yet recognize any of the words. Once or twice he was tempted by impatience to ask his assistant to translate it for him, but Hopper's training, somehow, and his instinct, prevented his showing a letter from a lady to another. So he worked away at that letter, word by word, and at the

Ad. Writing as a Money-Making Business

How Taught, and Why Skill Acquired by Mail Instruction Brings From $1200 to $6000 a Year

By GEORGE H. POWELL

THE modern business of advertising writing is arousing widespread attention throughout the commercial world, and the readers of THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, especially, are evincing unusual interest, as may be judged by the large number of young men and women who write me for the facts which my various writings in the periodical press can only hint at in the most casual way.

Business men, too, who feel the need of the great stimulus produced by up-to-date advertising, and who must attend to it themselves, largely because skilled ad. writers are entirely too few in number to lend their aid, are likewise consulting me, and the final result will not only greatly benefit their enterprises but it will materially advance the cause of good advertising, and be responsible for the building up of many a large business.

I find that the great body of my readers, while admitting the marvelous possibilities of advertising, are nevertheless loth to believe that the art of writing advertisements can be thoroughly taught by mail. It is for the benefit of these doubters that I am now writing, and while the allotted space is limited, yet much can be made clear.

I established my school at the urgent suggestion of notable advertising authorities, who realized the great need of expert instruction. The institutions that entered the field early were producing only limited results, due to a lack of expertness on the part of the instructors themselves, which had been especially unsatisfactory when business men enrolled to acquire skill in the preparation of their own ads. The Powell System, now generally conceded to be a correct method of teaching advertising writing, has been a marvelous success because it confines the student to ad. writing from start to finish. The "lecture" or "essay" idea finds no place since practice, not theory, produces expertness. Nor does the Powell System attempt to deal with the business management of agencies or newspapers. Concentration is the keynote.

The concrete principle — work — is the one factor that dominates my relations with the student from first to last.

The Powell System is the result of my long experience as a business and advertising expert, in addition to my experience, years before correspondence instruction was devised, in training a clerk in my own employ, who only took up the study of ad. writing because I assured him that it was "going to be the greatest business on earth in a few years."

How did I teach him? Why, simply by selecting a series of actual advertisements, explaining the good and bad elements, and requiring him to write out and prepare at home evenings his own efforts for my revision and criticism. And this, too, is the Powell System of to-day, save that my analysis and explanatory sheets now take the place of personal conversation, which the clerk referred to often forgot in many instances. And here is the superiority of the correspondence plan.

I taught this bright young man how to originate illustrative ideas and how to write in a catchy, taking vein, but being no artist myself, and unable even to make an attempt at drawing a representation of my teacher as a boy, I did not bother this first student with "drawing," which is a wholly unnecessary accomplishment in the ad. writer, although no handicap, of course. There is no such a thing as "born advertising originality." It is acquired only by study.

To-day this original student is one of the most celebrated and skillful ad. writers in America, and draws a large salary running into the thousands. And all he had at the start was a good common school education, coupled with steadfastness and a willingness to work.

There has never been a time since I gave the Powell System to the business world that a change of plan was ever found necessary, and the scores of young men and women I have instructed and made practical ad. writers, capable of earning from $25.00 a week up during the past year or two, are living examples of what I can do for ambitious people.

Added to my regular instruction is my examination of the business man's individual needs, and by recommending improvements, apart from the advertising instruction itself, I have won unstinted praise.

In a word, the student who completes my course of instruction is thoroughly grounded in the art of producing original advertising that will attract attention and create business — the kind of advertising that is to-day in active demand. And in this connection I may add that not a week passes that the most prominent business concerns in America do not apply to me for advertising talent — and frequently at salaries double what any recent graduate could hope to earn.

I shall be glad to mail my beautiful new Prospectus — the most meaty work of the sort ever published — to all business men who want more business and to all young men and women who want more salary or income. Simply address me George H. Powell, 196 Temple Court, New York, N. Y.

The most artistic and durable color effects on shingles are produced with Shingletint, which is a scientific combination of linseed oil, coloring matter, creosote, and the necessary drying agents.

Among the many shingle stains offered, Shingletint is conspicuous not only for its superiority, but because it can be called for by its distinctive name, thus offering the consumer protection against inferior goods offered for the same purpose.

When buying Shingle Stains it will be worth while to ignore the "just as good" argument and insist upon Shingletint.

end of six months had managed to pick it all out, thus learning the Russian words for "preserver," "hero," "chivalrous gentleman," "modern knight-errant," "undying gratitude," and several others which he would not have been apt to acquire in an ordinary course of lessons. He also learned that the Princess' town house was situated in the city of Moscow and her country residence about thirty versts distant therefrom. He was invited, if he ever visited Moscow, to call upon her; and was informed that she had taken up the study of English and hoped to be able to thank him sometime, in his own language, for having rescued her from a horrible fate. At the end of a year Hopper had occasion to go to Moscow on business, and he called upon the Princess. She received him with extreme cordiality and invited him to dinner. He was able to converse with her quite freely now, as he found that her English supplemented his Russian to such an extent that between them they were in possession of a vocabulary of considerable scope. The Princess proved to be the wittiest, best-natured and altogether the most charming woman that Hopper had ever met. His old-time friends in America will understand how thoroughly agreeable he must have made himself to the Princess. She could see at a glance that he felt at home in a palace. He left Moscow with an invitation to attend a house party at her country place during the coming winter season. He went, and found himself a favorite in Russian high society, through the Princess' patronage. In fact, he was commonly spoken of as "the American hero." So that is how it all came about. It seems the Princess fell in love with him on the General's boat, and so, when he bade her good-by one day, telling her that he should not trust himself to see her again, lest he should reveal sentiments which he felt were presumptuous, she replied shyly:

"That depends on how I should regard them."

To the objections of her relatives the Princess opposed the argument:

"If a Czar could marry a peasant girl, I don't see why a Princess cannot marry an American gentleman."

And that is how Courtland Hopper turned the tables on those foreigners who are marrying our American heiresses. By rights, he should bring his bride and her fortune over to this country; but there is little hope of that.

A Wheel of Misfortune

MR. HARVEY W. WILEY, Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, of the Department of Agriculture, is convinced that the world is progressing with great strides.

"It was not a great many years ago," said he, "that I was a member of the faculty of a Western University. It was there that a peculiar incident came very near injuring my career at its outset.

"You remember the early high bicycles. I was ardent and athletic. I bought a wheel and, discreetly confining to a secluded spot my efforts in learning to master my contumacious steed, I finally emerged safely astride my aërial seat and rode fearlessly across the campus to the steps of the laboratory.

"My colleagues and the students were divided between amusement and admiration, and I rode home that evening to the accompaniment of exclamations of grave astonishment and noisy acclaim. I met with no accident, and next morning again mounted my altitudinous wheel and made my way to the University grounds.

"As I was about to enter my office a friendly colleague greeted me with the confidential information that my bicycle exploit was creating comment of an unflattering character in the faculty. When I reached my desk I found an official letter from the Board of Trustees stating that charges had been preferred against me for gross and undignified disregard of the high and honorable traditions of the school, and I was cited to appear that day before a conclave of that august body.

"I had to refrain an impulse to laugh outright, but I saw they meant business and were deeply offended. Therefore, realizing the folly of letting a bicycle run away with my chances of a successful career, I professed my penitence and took solemn oath thereafter to walk sedately in the conventional path.

"I was not, however, to be let off so easily, and it was only through the full and hearty interposition of fellow-members of the faculty that I was saved from summary expulsion."

Substantial Investments that pay seven per cent. are not numerous.

It is double the ordinary bank rate of interest. Most shrewd investors are glad to get 5 per cent. and know that their money is safe. We are offering for public subscription a stock bearing 7 per cent. interest per annum, and an investment as reliable, we believe, as any bank in the country.

A limited amount of the 7 per cent. First Lien Preferred Stock of the

is offered for public subscription, subject to prior sale. Preferred as to assets, cumulative as to dividends.

Selling at par, $100. a share

Magnolia Anti-Friction Metal is famous the world over, and is used as a lining for machinery bearings of all kinds. Leading manufacturers in all parts of the country have stated, over their signatures, that Magnolia Metal is far superior to higher-priced babbitts.

A recent report of William Leslie & Co., chartered accountants, shows that the Company has earned, during the past five years,

An Average Annual Net Profit of Over $40,000

The present issue of Preferred Stock is for the purpose of increasing the working capital to enable the Company to keep up with the tremendous demand for its products.

The requirements of the New York Stock Exchange have been complied with in the preparation of the stock, and application will be made for listing on the Stock Exchange after the $200,000 seven per cent. first lien Preferred Stock has been allotted.

If you have money to invest, write for full particulars, including separate and special agreement, and for chartered accountant's report and prospectus.

WE TEACH THE BEST SYSTEM BY MAIL

LEARN TO WRITE SHORTHAND

GIVE YOUR SPARE TIME TO HOME STUDY

Stenography as it Should be Taught, and as No Other Man Ever Taught It

The name "Page-Davis Company" has always stood for the highest standard of correspondence instruction.

Students enrolling with this institution are placed under the direct, personal instruction of Robert F. Rose, the official reporter of the last Democratic National Convention and the only stenographer accompanying the late President McKinley throughout his great western tour.

The beginner is given the advantage of expert, practical instruction from the very start and he therefore learns nothing that he has to undo later in the course.

Our graduates write expert shorthand and READ it.

Our graduate stenographers are not timid for fear of incompetency. Their proficiency makes them self-confident.

Employers do not find it necessary to "educate" our graduates.

We will double the speed of stenographers of any other system and qualify them for expert court reporting. Our book, "Progress in Shorthand," mailed free. It tells everything.

President Roosevelt's Newsboy

THIS IS WILLIAM SMITH, the boy who sells THE SATURDAY EVENING POST to President Roosevelt every Thursday. Last fall William started to sell THE POST in Washington. He already sold newspapers. One day, after he had received his supply of the out-of-town newspapers, he passed the White House and noticed that some papers which he had had for almost two hours were just being delivered. Next day was THE SATURDAY EVENING POST day. As soon as he had gotten his package he started for the White House on his bicycle at top speed, and sold as many copies as possible among the attachés. A few days later the President noticed a newspaper which he knew was to contain something in which he was interested. He called for his copy, but was told that it had not yet arrived.

Inquiry was made as to where the copy which he had seen came from. He was told that "it was delivered by William Smith, THE SATURDAY EVENING POST boy," it being related how he had been supplying the White House staff ahead of the regular carrier. The President left instructions with Secretary Cortelyou that William be brought to him. He shook hands with him and said that thereafter he wanted him to deliver his copies of the daily papers and THE SATURDAY EVENING POST. The story of "The President's Newsboy" traveled, and now, in addition to his newspapers, William sells from 400 to 500 copies of THE POST each week, principally to members of Congress, the President's household, and department clerks. He recently purchased two building lots with his earnings.

$250 IN EXTRA CASH PRIZES

Will be Given Next Month to Boys Who Do Good Work

There are 6000 boys like William Smith selling THE SATURDAY EVENING POST all over the country. They do it Friday afternoons after school hours and on Saturdays. Some are making $15.00 a week. We want more boys. It costs nothing to start; we send the first week's supply of 10 copies free. If you write to-day, YOU CAN START NEXT WEEK.

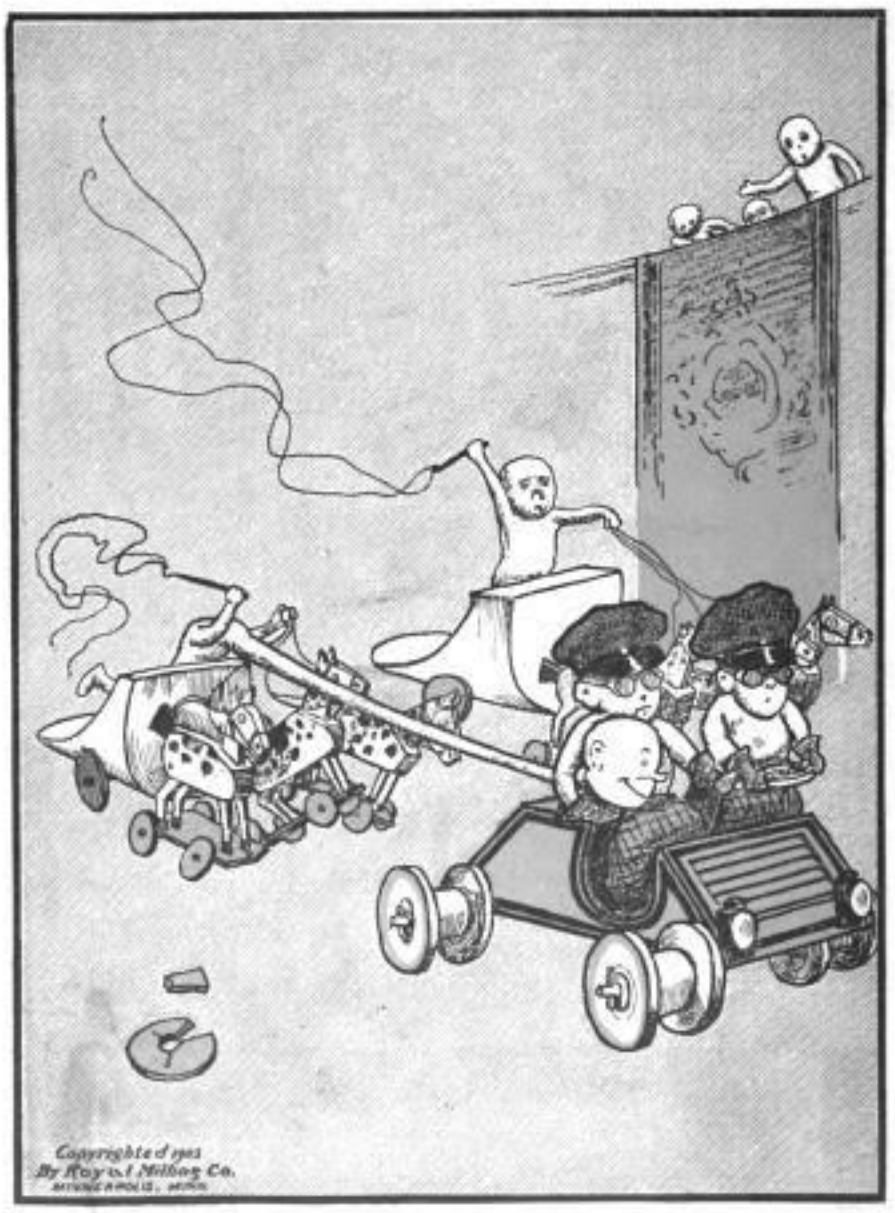
BEN-HUR FLOUR

Have you ever tried it? If not a pleasant surprise is in store for you. There is a very evident "something" about BEN-HUR FLOUR that wins your approval at once. It has six principal points of superiority. The first one is "Quality" and the other five are "Goodness".

SEND us the card or bill head of one retail grocer in your town who does not sell BEN-HUR FLOUR, and we will send you, free of charge, a splendid story book for children called "THE BEN-HUR DOUGH BOYS." "The Chariot Race" is a sample page taken from this book. Many other adventures of the rollicking crew are equally well written and illustrated in bright colors.

THE DOUGH BOYS' CHARIOT RACE.



The sportive Dough Boys planned a race
  Their nimble steeds to try:
For they enjoyed a track event
  As well as you or I.
The day had come, the track was fine,
  No clouds hung o'er the sky.

Their horses were but wooden toys:
  You might have thought them slow,
For you have really, truly nags
  Which can like lightning go.
But wooden horses are the things
  For little boys of dough.

Each charioteer made up his mind
  That he would not be last.
Clang! Clang! rang out the starter's bell,
  Off sped the racers fast:
When, like a streak, a spool-mobile
  With Dough Boys two whizzed past.

The hindmost racer saw a chance
  To have a bit of fun.
Beneath the "chuffer's" arm he tucked
  His head, as by they spun.
Out stretched his neck across the line—
  Thus, "by a neck" he won.

The Breaking-in of Quincy Bolivar

BY GEORGE ADE

—SHOUTED AFTER HIM, "HOORAY FOR BOLIVAR, AND A ROPE TO HANG HIM"

QUINCY BOLIVAR always felt that he had been cut out for a political career. He had the name, to begin with. The Honorable Quincy Bolivar, Congressman—how the name balances the title!

Even as a gangling country boy, attending school No. 8 in Purvis Township, he had felt the oratory surging within him. At Friday afternoon debates he put to rout the stolid farm hands pitted against him. In Purvis Township it was frequently said that Quincy had "the gift of gab" and that the farm would never hold him. Full many a good plowman is spoiled in the making of a second-rate lawyer, but in the case of Quincy there was no mistaking the signboard of destiny. He had no natural love for horses and no enthusiasm for the hay-field. He wore white shirts right in the middle of the week and wrote for the country paper when he should have been repairing fences.

Therefore it was agreed that Quincy's only hope lay either in the pulpit or at the bar. His mother rather favored the pulpit, although several friends of her late husband had advised her that there was no money in preaching. Quincy wanted to be a lawyer, because the law is next door to politics.

Long before he went away to attend Atwater College he had made special trips to Musselwhite, and there in the old courthouse he had sat with his chin resting on the wooden rail that divided the humble public from the glorious lights of the legal profession, listening to the impassioned appeals made by Tom Gridley, Bill Catterson and Eli Bilcote. He hoped that some day he should be on the other side of that railing. He wanted to sit there with the Gridleys and Cattersons and have open law-books at his right hand. He wanted to pace up and down in front of those twelve solemn farmers and sweep away their stubborn unbelief with the fury of eloquence, as he had seen Tom Gridley do it. He wanted to sit, calm and Gibraltarish, smiling in hard disdain at the shrieking attacks of opposing counsel, as he had seen Bill Catterson do it. And he longed to acquire that defiant and resonant tone with which Eli Bilcote hurled his objections at old Judge Blakely.

After each visit to the courtroom he went back to the farm with a hungering ambition to give up manual labor, go out into the waiting world and talk his way to fame. So Mrs. Bolivar yielded to his importunities and he went away to Atwater College. He matriculated on a Thursday and joined the Demosthenean Literary and Debating Club next day. Before the close of his first term he was known on the campus as "Fog-Horn" Bolivar, but even those who derided his vocal exertions admitted that probably he would be a great success in politics.

For the purposes of this narrative it is not necessary to follow him through college. Let it be known that he entered Atwater in a suit of store clothes, wearing a low soft hat with a buckle on one side. He came home with a "Prince Albert" costume and a silk hat, both of which he soon laid away in order to tranquilize the agricultural vote and bring himself into closer communion with those fellow-citizens whom he hoped to represent in Congress. During his senior year Quincy Bolivar won second prize at the State oratorical contest. He lost first place only by a split of one per cent. in the markings of the judges. It will be forever set down that one of the judges was unduly prejudiced in favor of the winning college because his nephew was a student there. But even a second prize in such a mighty contest is no mean glory. Quincy Bolivar brought home a large prestige and already the expectations began to cluster about him.

He visited his mother in Purvis Township and then he said good-by to the growing crops, without the slightest note of regret in his voice, and settled in Musselwhite, where he began the study of law in the office of Tom Gridley. Within an incredibly short time he was admitted to the bar. When at last he moved beyond the railing and sat among the giants he discovered that they were not such towering giants, after all. Distance lends enchantment to lawyers. When Quincy Bolivar was admitted to that close fraternity the members of which fight one another in public and lovingly swap anecdotes in private, he began to find out the weaknesses and shortcomings of Catterson, Bilcote and even the redoubtable Gridley. They were self-made lawyers, who relied upon vociferation rather than upon any accurate knowledge of law or the rules of rhetoric. They were meant for Musselwhite but not for Washington. Quincy Bolivar found it impossible to look up to them. He met them boldly and in the proud consciousness that his association with them was merely an incident of his rising career.

Quincy Bolivar wore a broad hat and permitted a careless forelock to hang down his forehead. Usually his vest was buttoned only half way up and the expanse of shirt front was immaculate. He did not adopt the story-telling and shoulder-slapping methods of the rural "mixer." The shoulder-slapper may be elected to the county board and sometimes he breaks into the legislature, but the would-be Congressman must wear that gentle reserve, aye, even the meditative melancholy suggested by the steel engravings of Henry Clay and Daniel Webster. Therefore, on a Saturday afternoon when the farm wagons and side-bar buggies made a continuous fringe around the courthouse square and the boardwalks were cluttered with the free and independent voters of the back townships, and Quincy Bolivar moved from group to group, quietly laying foundations, his salutation was grave, even though his hand-grasp was warm.

AND HE LOOKED HIS FELLOW-MAN STRAIGHT IN THE EYE

HE HAD SAT WITH HIS CHIN RESTING ON THE WOODEN RAIL

His "How do you do, sir?" was clear-cut and sonorous, and he looked his fellow-man straight in the eye. Those who were honored by his civilities watched him as he passed and agreed that he was the rising orb of Musselwhite.

He first distinguished himself on Memorial Day. The town hall, known on occasions as the "opera house," was packed. Quincy Bolivar came to the table in the centre of the rostrum. He took a drink of water and gazed pensively at the assemblage for many seconds without speaking. Yet there was something in the calm self-possession of his bearing to indicate that the pause was not one of indecision. One secret of the art of acting is to learn the value of the pause. He began quietly, almost inaudibly. He spoke of a pastoral landscape with a white cottage nestling in the foreground, vines growing above the doorway, the kine coming homeward in the twilight, and the voices of happy children. Into this happy abode came war's loud alarum. Quincy Bolivar drew the picture of the young husband and the weeping wife and the last embrace at the rustic gate and the marching away of the volunteers to the rattle of drums and the martial sound of fifing. He drew aside the curtain and showed the bivouac in the moonlight and the man in tattered uniform—sleeping, and dreaming of the loved ones. He raised his hand and said "Hark!"—and his listeners heard the sullen rumble of distant artillery and the tense commands running along the lines and coming nearer and nearer, in dramatic crescendo. They saw the impetuous line of gray sweep across the open. They heard the crash of volleys—they saw the battle-flags topple and fall and rise again, and they were carried on into the hell of battle, while the maddened cheers rang in their ears. They saw a haggard soldier boy, his features set in dismay, kneel beside a fallen comrade and hear that last gasping message, while darkness fell upon the battlefield. And then he told of a grassy mound on a sun-kissed hill—little children and gray-haired women coming with flowers, and the old flag rippling in the breeze with not one star missing from the field of blue—a glorious banner lifted high, to wave forevermore above a happy and reunited people.

When Quincy Bolivar sat down that Memorial Day he knew that he had captured Musselwhite. Among all the faces lifted toward him he saw only one—a face flushed with pride and triumph, even though the eyes glistened with tears. At that moment a prophetic vision came to him. It was a vision of the Honorable Quincy Bolivar arising in his place, while all the Congressmen squared around to listen, and there in the gallery Mary Harland leaned forward to hear her husband's first speech in the National Legislature.

Grover Cleveland began as sheriff. Why should not Quincy Bolivar begin as State's attorney? The nomination sought him.

Two days after the convention he and Tom Gridley sat in the law office, looking out through the open windows at the swaying maples of the courthouse grove.

"I have one satisfaction," said the candidate reflectively. "It will be a clean campaign. Catterson and I are personal friends. Let the voters choose between us. Fortunately, I have no record to be misconstrued and attacked. The worst thing that they can say about me is that I am young and inexperienced. But I don't believe Hicks will open up on me. We've served together as officers of the lodge, and, besides, I used to send in items for the paper when I lived out in Purvis Township."

Tom Gridley, with an unlighted cigar tucked away back in the corner of his mouth, nodded his head and smiled grimly.

"'Man cometh up as a flower,'" he said. "'He cometh up as a flower.' Then he gets into politics and finds out that he is a Canadian thistle. You may not have any past just now, but you will have one in less than a month. Hicks is the editor of a party organ, and if his grandmother ran for something on the opposition ticket I'm inclined to think that he would investigate the old lady and discover that she was a criminal character. All's fair in love, war and politics. Hicks can meet you fraternally in the lodge-room on Thursday evening and then lambast you in the paper next day. And what's so darned annoying about these campaign lies is that they always have the affidavits to back them up. You are young and purty and just out of college, but you'll get it, and get it good, Quincy. If you don't you'll be the first man that ever run for office in Jefferson County and come out with a whole scalp."

It happened that even as they were talking the Liscomb boy, who was reading law in the office, came in with a copy of the Musselwhite Leader, still damp from the press.

"Now you'll find out what Brother Hicks thinks of you," said Tom Gridley. "Turn to the editorial section an' read it, an' look pleasant."

Quincy found the article. It was headed, "Veal or Brains — Which?" and it proceeded to put some straightforward questions to the patriotic and thoughtful voters of Jefferson County. It asked these voters what manner of man they wanted for State's attorney — a learned and experienced lawyer with a record as spotless as newly-fallen snow, or a gabby young whipper-snapper who wore a tall collar and whose only stock in trade was an unlimited supply of east wind. In language the portent of which could not be mistaken, the Leader went on to say that never in the history of Jefferson County had there been a more amazing contrast than the one between the towering intellect of Catterson and the obstreperous imbecility of the squirt who had been torn from the nursing-bottle and laid, a squawling sacrifice, on the altar of political necessity.

"Read it out loud," said Tom Gridley, and Quincy read it in a voice tremulous with rage, while the old wheel-horse teetered in his chair and guffawed from unalloyed enjoyment.

"That ain't bad — for an opening shot," he said. "Of course, in a couple of months, when the campaign's thoroughly warmed up and they begin to deal in personalities, you'll get it a good deal worse'n that. At the same time, it's purty fair, for a curtain-raiser. Catterson ought to have been an editor."

"Catterson!"

"Certainly — he wrote it. He's been usin' that 'sacrifice on the altar of political necessity' for twenty years. The best way to set yourself right before the public is to write your own recommendations. You wait and see what I say about Catterson in the Star. If I don't make him out a horse-thief an' a child-murderer it'll be because there ain't enough language left in the dictionary. But don't lose your temper, Quincy. Remember that every candidate is a target, an' the more bricks they throw at him the madder it makes his friends an' the harder they'll work for him. I figure that this is going to be an active campaign."

"Active" is a poor and insufficient adjective with which to describe the battle that raged between the forces of Catterson and the devoted followers of Bolivar. Within two weeks the neophyte learned that he was a feeble-minded figurehead, whose criminal instincts were rendered harmless only by the fact that he had not sufficient mentality to put his base plans into operation. Little boys on the street — boys who had been in his Sunday-school class — shouted after him, "Hooray for Bolivar, and a rope to hang him!" Men with whom he had hobnobbed on the corners began to look at him with scowling suspicion, for he was daily accused of being an enemy to labor, a religious heretic, a tool of the county ring, and a secret agent of the saloon interests. He rode hither and thither, shouting his defiance in country schoolhouses until his voice wore to a husky whisper and he was gaunted up and wild-eyed. Through it all he guarded every act and utterance so that no mistake could arise from the past and smite him when finally he had received that nomination for Congress.

His real breaking-in as a politician came three weeks before election. Let those who are free from Congressional ambitions sit in judgment on his conduct. The facts shall tell for themselves.

The Catterson party raised a liberty pole in Musselwhite. Two hickory trunks, spliced to a prodigious length, were up-ended at one corner of the courthouse square to an accompaniment of beating drums and loud cheering. Catterson made a speech in which he called Bolivar all the names that he had neglected calling him up to that time. It was the star effort of the Catterson campaign and a crimson Saturday for Musselwhite, attracting the outside townships and making the whole afternoon one orgy of martial music, exploding popcorn, cracking peanuts and gushing lemonade.

Among those who listened to Catterson's verbal evisceration of the odious Bolivar were five free voters from Purvis Township. They had known Quincy Bolivar ever since he had been knee-high to a duck. They were for him, not in any tentative spirit, but "for keeps," as they put it. Therefore, when they heard him ridiculed and denounced and held up to the scorn of all honest men and good women, a righteous anger filled them and they went to the Atlas bar and tried to cool their wrath with bottled beer.

The attack upon Quincy Bolivar was an indirect insult to Purvis Township and they longed for vengeance — a longing which became more intense as the evening lengthened and the discussion of their wrongs became more heated. One of them proposed the tarring and feathering of Catterson. This plan was abandoned, owing to the lateness of the hour and the probable difficulties to be encountered.

"I'll tell you what we kin do," said Cale Tilford. "Let's go an' chop down the liberty pole."

HE WENT DOWN AND MET HIS LOYAL SUPPORTERS

At eleven P. M. Quincy Bolivar was in his room at Mrs. Buford's boarding-house preparing a dignified reply to Catterson's undignified speech of the afternoon, when he heard the rattle of pebbles on his window and saw five men, in white hats, clustered in the moonlight. He went down and met his loyal supporters. They had stolen an ax from the rear of Wooderson's ice-cream parlor and restaurant for farmers, and they were on their way to chop down the liberty pole and thereby right the wrongs of one whom they loved, even as a brother. They wanted "Quince" to go along and participate in the performance. He entreated them to return the ax, hook up and drive home. He said that all the troubled issues of the campaign should be referred to the sober judgment of the voters. They shook hands with him and told him he was right. Then they went down to the courthouse square and attacked the pole, which fell across Main Street and demolished the wooden awning in front of Gunnison's hardware store.

Next day, when the infuriated Cattersonites were investigating what they termed a "hellish outrage," a disinterested witness, one Link Saulsbury, came forward with the information that he had passed Mrs. Buford's boarding-house about eleven o'clock, that he saw Quincy Bolivar in company with five other men, that one of the men had an ax, and that he distinctly heard talk in regard to chopping down the pole. Quincy Bolivar, righteous candidate, and Tom Gridley, practical politician, sat in the office and discussed the new and threatening issue.

"The boys did come after me and I thought I had talked them out of it," said Quincy. "There's only one thing for me to do. I'll come out and tell the truth."

"And lose Purvis Township," added Tom. "Rule number one in a campaign is to stick up for those who are with you. If you tell the truth you'll indict the bulwark of our support in Purvis Township and go down in history as the man who went back on his friends. And besides, the opposition won't believe you. In politics, when you get cornered, there's only one thing to do and that's the 'silent contempt' game. Come out and say that you will not insult the intelligence of the good people of this community by stooping to deny such a damnable calumny. Besides, I know a man who is going to make affidavit that Catterson's men cut down that pole so as to get sympathy."

On election night, when Quincy Bolivar checked up the townships and saw a slender majority of forty, he heaved a sigh of relief and said: "That liberty-pole business came mighty near beating me. It would have — only for Purvis Township. It's sure to come up against me when I run again."

"Remember what I told you," said Gridley. "Silent contempt."

The Doom of the Giant Redwood

AFTER defying countless vicissitudes during from ten to forty centuries, the oldest living things on the planet, the California Big Tree (Sequoia sempervirens), the Pinus ponderosus and the Pinus Lambertiana are in many instances succumbing to the depredations of an insignificant caterpillar. This tiny insect is called the sequoia aegerinian, and is related to the common peach-tree borer. Some malign instinct seems to have taught this worm that the vulnerable spot in these mighty trees is the axils of the branches. The sinking of his tunnels there diverts the flow of sap: a formation of resinous nodules follows, which effectively check the circulation of the tree's life-fluid. The unnourished limb then dies, and at last the tree itself is slain by its pygmy enemies.

In the smaller groves the ravages of the insect may be averted by digging the larvæ out with knives, but no practical remedy has been devised for safeguarding the larger forests. The subject is engaging the attention of expert foresters.

Another factor which threatens the existence of these famous redwoods is the growing recognition of their timber value. On account of antiseptic properties in the wood, no species of decay-producing fungi has ever been found in the timber. Giant trees up-rooted 500 years ago and which through the ensuing centuries have lain where they fell, exposed to all the elements that cause decay, have been found to be absolutely sound and have been shipped to the sawmills and converted into lumber. This antiseptic character of the redwood is causing a growing demand for the timber in general construction, and particularly for the walling of tunnels. Moreover, the discovery made by Captain Ahern in the Philippines that California redwood was not subject to the depredations of white ants or termites has created a great demand for this wood in the Archipelago, where only a few of the native woods, and those of the most valuable varieties, are immune from the ravages of these formidable insects.

Hitherto the market for redwood has been confined largely to Pacific Coast cities where its commercial value was known. Shingles made of redwood last nearly half a century. The wood is devoid of resin, which gives it great resistance to fire, and is therefore in demand for building purposes, particularly in San Francisco. One secret of the vast age attained by redwood forests is that its bark is fireproof. Fires have repeatedly raged in redwood forests, managing to destroy the young trees, but unable to penetrate the asbestos-like sheathing of the monarchs.

Now that the trade in redwood is growing, that occasional cargoes are shipped to Australia, Honolulu, the Philippines, and other parts of the Orient, and that dealers in the eastern part of the United States are sending in orders for the timber, naturalists interested in preserving these trees are making efforts to introduce better methods of lumbering. At present twenty-five per cent. of the timber is destroyed in felling the trees, and the custom of totally denuding the forest areas, leaving bare ridges to be worn down by winter torrents, has prevented a second growth from either saplings or seeds.

It is the purpose of the foresters at work in California to urge that the young redwoods be left standing for future cutting. Freed from the shade of the large trees they grow with remarkable rapidity. Trees that have increased scarcely any in diameter in one hundred years have started up like saplings when overshadowing monarchs have been removed. The forests are so dense that the present methods of lumbering frequently crush and utterly destroy far more timber than is taken out.

One thing that has helped to avert the annihilation of the biggest trees at the hands of ruthless commerce is that in falling it not infrequently happens that a forest giant's prodigious weight causes it to be totally pulverized. Foresters have witnessed instances of a big tree failing to yield an available foot of timber, so complete was its destruction in falling. Furthermore, the wood fibres having been formed under different rates of growth during the centuries of the tree's life, the grain of the successive concentric zones is not in proportion. A condition of such tension is thus produced that sometimes, even when the timber has withstood the shock of the fall, logs when sawed split with a thunderous sound.

These facts have assisted the efforts made to protect the big trees, and some of the owners of groves, who purchased the tracts for lumbering purposes, will, it is believed, hold the areas of the biggest trees until public sentiment causes them to be purchased for State or National parks.

By David Graham Phillips

HOW THE MINORITY INTEREST IS MADE A STALKING-HORSE FOR HOLD-UP MEN, STRIKERS AND BLACKMAILERS

A YEAR ago last February half a dozen from among the principal figures in the present movement toward transportation and industrial and financial "combines" happened to be lunching together one day—a leisure hour snatched from the wild scramble of Wall Street's short morning and shorter afternoon. The conversation turned upon a suit a small stockholder in one of the "combines" had just brought against it. He was urging that by a certain contemplated move of the all-powerful "inside ring" his rights as a stockholder were being trampled, or at least put in jeopardy.

"We're just trying to find out how much of an 'inducement' he wants to make him drop the suit," said a director in that particular "combine." "He has a hundred shares—bought 'em just to enable him to get standing in court for this raid on us. They're worth about $13,000 market value. I suppose we may have to pay him $50,000 or $60,000 for them."

"But why?" inquired the one man present who wasn't in a "combine."

"Oh, to save trouble. We want to make our move and make it right away—it means big money to us. He can drag the suit along and delay us a year—perhaps two years. It's cheaper to buy him off than to fight him. And he knows it, the blackmailing scoundrel!"

"But I should think if this were generally known you'd bankrupt yourselves, settling with such fellows—with strikers and blackmailers."

"It is getting pretty bad," admitted the director.

"Last year we paid one chap over $300,000 for shares worth about $40,000," said a director in another "combine."

"He's a big lawyer. About ten years ago there was a howl against a certain corporation and he, in good faith, or only for popularity, brought suit against it in the name of a small stockholder, to compel it to do the very expensive but not unreasonable thing the public was demanding. The corporation 'settled' for a considerable sum. That gave him his taste of blood. He has learned how eager the big corporations are for peace and how much money he can get by merely threatening them with war. He now makes it his principal business to put forward a dummy client who has bought from ten to a thousand shares, and through him to compel this corporation to stand and deliver. If the corporation is in a hurry, even though it has, or probably has, perfect legal right to do what his client pretends to object to, he makes it take his client's shares at a big figure—and adds on enormous 'counsel fees.'"

"And," broke in a representative of another kind of "combine," "if he discovers a case where the corporation doesn't want its conduct aired or is unwilling that the legal points involved should be passed upon and settled by the courts, his collection is something huge. No wonder he's a millionaire and spending money like water all the time."

"We've got to make a stand some time, I suppose," said the first director. "He's putting up a job now that looks like a grab for a million or so."

"Why not make our stand now—right away?" demanded the second director.

The others looked somewhat doubtful. To make a stand when one has a clear case of right, with law and public sentiment on one's side, is all well enough—though even there the long delay inevitable in litigation would be costly. But how about it where the law is doubtful or, worse still, dead against one? There was a long and animated discussion.

The Evolution of the Striker

USUALLY, when a "combine" organizes a new policy all of the interests that are "worth considering" are consulted and placated. The little fellows meekly accept whatever may be given to them by the big fellows or are "squeezed out"—if they do not take the hint and drop out of their own accord. No matter how seriously their rights may be infringed, they never think of combating the arrogant "inside ring" that controls all the machinery and all the wealth of the corporation. They know that lawyers cost money, that good lawyers cost hundreds of dollars a day; that it is almost as expensive to win as to lose a suit against a corporation; that either way it is ruin for any but the rich. So whenever a small stockholder engages good lawyers and brings suit to prevent a new departure in policy—a purchase, or a conversion, or a bond issue—the assumption is that he is what corporations call a "striker" or a "blackmailer." If not, why should he go to law, when going to law means no possible gain to him unless it be a gain to establish, or to try to establish, an abstract principle at the cost of impoverishment?

People with old-fashioned ethical ideas might pause just here and inquire: If the corporation dare not let the courts pass upon its conduct, how are its directors any better morally than the man who seeks to profit by their insolent and unlawful greediness? The answer to this disquieting question is twofold. First, the corporation is not always in the wrong, but is often simply in a hurry, and so buys up the "blackmailer" because purchase is the cheapest and most expeditious course, and hates him because he is using the courts maliciously to obstruct the corporation's progress. Doing evil that good may come is an old-established, highly respected canon of morals—respected by none more than by corporations. Second, where the corporation fears the searchlight of the court, or does not wish to have the legality of certain modes of procedure tested, the difference between "striker" and "struck" is one of those delicate points in Wall Street ethics which a Wall Street man can see with perfect clearness—though he cannot always make an outsider see it.

But to return. Soon after their discussion at luncheon and their resolve to end blackmail, these great men of Wall Street sent a committee to certain eminent lawyers, and the lawyers put the new policy into legal shape in this fashion:

First: fight everybody who brings suit. Go into his private affairs as deeply as may be and publicly show, or try to show, that he has no real interest in the corporation, that he bought his shares merely for purposes of blackmail, that he is conspiring to injure the corporation and to use the courts for improper purposes.

Second: fight every suit, regardless of the real or apparent intent of the suer, as long as possible, and boldly and publicly assume that it is the suit of a "striker" and stock-jobber.

Third: make litigation as expensive as possible.

To the second clause there is one exception. When a suer has a clear record and a clear case and exposure in court would be dangerous, compromise! But this exception rarely arises. It has not arisen since the new departure was made. At least, if it has the fact has not become public. The reason why compromise may have been rarely necessary has already been stated—all "considerable" interests are consulted and placated before a new policy is definitely inaugurated. But of the other kinds of cases—defense of suits brought by negligible minority holders—there have been many, all of them sensational.

The chief interest in the above recital of facts is that it is the first published account of the move that has led to these sensational suits—indeed, the first news that these suits are the outcome of a definite, concerted, carefully-organized policy. And the first large "striker" who was caught in the new net was none other than the lawyer who has profited so hugely by his discovery of the exceeding, even wormlike, peaceableness of corporations, and how to exploit it.

The Aggressive Defense of the Trust of Trusts

AMONG the men who have thus combined in this new and curious kind of trust are men who personally detest each other and were a few years ago doing everything in their power to injure one another—and still strive to overreach and out-general one another.

As was pointed out above, usually the bringing of a suit by a small stockholder is on the face of it suspicious. It would not be so in England, where a man will fight a railway single-handed for years, and at an expense of thousands of pounds, to recover a shilling wrongfully exacted from him for a ticket. But in this land of the easy-going, principle-be-hanged-if-its-going-to-ruin-me-to-vindicate-it human being, the man who thinks he's wronged in a small way doesn't often go to law with a colossus—unless he has planned a raid. If the object of this new "trust of trusts" were simply to prosecute blackmailing delayers of legitimate enterprise, its existence would be something to commend in a paragraph before passing on to more interesting matters. But the object is far wider than that. And the methods by which the object is pursued are often relentless to the point of constituting a crime in itself equal to the alleged intended crime of the "striker."

It has given such tremendous public demonstrations of its power and its ruthlessness that hardy indeed would be the small stockholder who, however oppressed, would bring suit against his titanic corporate oppressor. He knows that the filing of the papers would be the signal for the descent of a swarm of spies and shadowers, for a prying search into every part of his private affairs, for the lining up of all the forces at the command of literally billions of capital to assault and to demolish him. One of the organizers, if not the originator, of the new trust is a director in a company which, at a secret meeting of its board of directors a few months ago, resolved on a line of policy which, when publicly announced, would cause the stock to drop at least ten dollars, perhaps thirty dollars, a share. Here was a rare chance for "insiders" to make money by "unloading." The stock began to go up under sly manipulation of the market and the rumor bureau, and this particular director advised all his acquaintances, including several friends who had the right to think themselves his intimates, that they "couldn't do better than buy——. It's going to go up." And it did presently go up, so great was the pressure to buy on the strength of this widely distributed "friendly tip." Then—the director above mentioned and other real "insiders" having "unloaded" on their acquaintances and the gulled public—the new policy was announced. Down went the stock. And the deceived acquaintances and "friends" of the director lost tens, perhaps hundreds, of thousands of dollars.

A Wall Street "light" to whom the writer related this incident said by way of conscientious comment: "Clever, wasn't it? He couldn't have thought of a better scheme for putting the stock up where he could unload at a big profit than to tip those known to be his friends that it was a good time to buy. And he taught 'em a mighty valuable lesson—not to gamble in Wall Street."

"But they were his friends."

"I suppose you'd have had him tip 'em to sell. Then where would his profits have come from, with everybody selling and the price going down?"

Fighting the Devil with Fire

WAIVING this interesting ethical dilemma there remains the main question: Is it likely that men of the stripe of so many of the prime movers in the new trust are going to use this concentrated power only to good ends? Is not a bad man, in his enthusiasm for a good cause, liable to relapse into his former errors of moral judgment and confuse good causes and bad, honest methods with rascally ones? Is not a temperate and partially reformed devil's disciple a dangerous person to trust in fighting the devil with fire?

It is one thing for a small private stockholder to bring suit; it is vastly different when the trust in which the biggest trusts are, or ought to be, mere small stockholders—the trust of wealth and power formed by 80,000,000 Americans—brings an exactly similar suit. When the Attorney-General began Wall Street did not believe he was in earnest. It denounced him and the President for "playing politics" with "big interests." As the evidence has accumulated that the President was really in earnest, Wall Street's fury has risen, and its organs are raging against him—some by the attack direct, others—and they are the most dangerous—by the insidious attack of apparently innocent enthusiasm for him. These organs first allege that he is doing something or other which the public would not approve if it were true; then they either praise him extravagantly for this alleged act or sorrowfully reproach him in the tone of a grieved best friend. And the public is doubly fooled—fooled into believing the President has done something he never dreamed of doing; fooled into believing the Wall Street organs are in sympathy with him and rejoice in his victories and grieve over his defeats and mistakes.

Wall Street is "chuck full" of human nature—and that means that its self-interest is the dominant factor in its moral point of view. In the opinion of the "conservative" big men of Wall Street, any sort of attack upon a "combine" is a wicked attempt to destroy the prosperity of the country.

Does this attitude seem absurdly intolerant? Remember that money-making is to Wall Street what swill is to swine—the whole of life, the alpha and omega, breath and blood. Remember that any one who even so much as frowns in the direction of the swill-trough is in so far a menace to the supply of swill. And what does the big drove, big rooters and little, care who pours its swill or whence its swill comes? All that concerns it is that it shall come, and that it shall go—down their wide, eager throats.

No, men do not go to Wall Street to make love or friends, or to lay up treasure in Heaven. They go to make money; and they are fierce against anything or anybody that disturbs or threatens to disturb them. And, like most men organized for a purpose, they erect it into a moral cause. They are, so they tell each other, defenders and promoters and originators of "prosperity." They erect their own personal prosperity into the prosperity of all—are they not "all"? The next step is to make prosperity a patriotism. From that the transition is easy to regarding even their doubtful acts as justifiable for the sake of the patriotic motive behind them.

The "trust of trusts" is only a year old—a year and about three months. It has grown rapidly in public importance through the many sensational, some unquestionably useful, acts. But if prosperity lasts, what it has done is small in comparison with what it will do. Its evolutions are worth watching—closely and critically. But judicially, too—for there are blackmailers in Wall Street, and honest corporate managements suffer from them.

The Mascot of Battery B

AS FOR THE CAPTAIN HE SAT DOWN AND REGULARLY CRIED

She Perched on the Belcherous Cannon's Back and Rode the Battery to Good Luck

BY LLOYD OSBOURNE

BATTERY A had a mascot goat, and Battery C a Filipino kid, and Battery D a parrot that could swear in five languages, but I guess we were the only battery in the brigade that carried an old lady! Filipino, nothing! But white as yourself and from Oakland, California, and I don't suppose I'd be here talking to you now if it hadn't been for her.

I had known Benny a long time—Benny was her son, you know, the only one she had—and when I enlisted at the beginning of the war Benny wished to do it, too, only he was scared to death, not of the Spaniards, but of his old ma! So he hung off and on while I drilled at the Presidio and rode free on the street cars and did the little hero act and ate pie the whole day long. My! How they used to bring us pies in them times and boxes of cigars—and flowers! Flowers to burn! Well I remember a Wisconsin regiment marching along Market Street, big, splendid men from the up North woods, every one of them with a calla-lily stuck in his gun! Oh, it was fine, with the troops pouring in and the whole city afire to receive them and the girls almost cutting the clothes off your back for souvenirs—and it made Benny sick to see it all, him clerking in a hardware store and eating his heart out to go with the boys. He hung back as long as he could, but at last he couldn't stand it any longer, and the day before we sailed he went and enlisted in my Battery.

He knew there was going to be a rumpus at home and I suppose that was why he put it off to the very end, not wanting to be plagued to death or cried over. But when he got into his uniform and had done a spell of goose-step with the first sergeant, he was so blamed rattled about going home that he had to take me along, too. He lived away off somewheres in a poorish sort of neighborhood, all little frame houses and little front yards about that big, where you could see commuters watering calla-lilies in their city clothes. Benny's house seemed the smallest and poorest of the lot, though it had calla-lilies, too, and other sorts of flowers, and a mat with "Welcome" on it, and some kind of a dog that licked our hands as we walked up the front steps and answered to the name of Dook.

Benny pushed open the door and went in, me at his heels, and both of us nervous as cats. His mother was sitting in a rocker reading the evening paper with gold spectacles, and I never saw such a straight-backed old lady in my life, nor any so tall and thin and commanding. She looked up at us, kind of startled to see two soldiers walking into her kitchen, and Benny smiled a silly smile and said:

"Mamma, I'm off to help Dooey in the Fillypines!"

I guess he thought she'd jump at him or something, for he had always been a mother's boy and minded everything she said, though he was twenty-eight years old and rising nine—but all she did was to draw in her breath sharp and sudden, so you could hear the whistle of it, and then two big tears rolled out under her specs.

"Don't feel bad about it, mamma," said Benny in a snuffly voice.

She never said a word, but got up from the chair and came over to where Benny was, very white and trembly, and looking at his army coat like it was a shroud.

"Oh, my son, my son," she said, kind of choking.

"I couldn't stay behind when all the boys was going," he said.

I saw he was holding back all he could to keep from crying, and I didn't blame him either, as we was to sail the next day and the old lady was his ma. It's them good-byes that break a soldier all up. So I lit out and played with the dog, and made him jump through my hands and fetch sticks and give his paw (he was quite a remarkable dog, that dog, though his breeding wasn't much), while I could hear them inside talking and talking, and the old lady's voice running on about the danger of drink and how he mustn't sleep in wet clothes or give back talk to his officers—it was wonderful the horse-sense that old lady had—and how he must respeck the uniform he wore, and be cheerful and willing and brave like his sainted father who was dead—all that mothers say and sometimes what soldiers do—and through it all there was a pleasant rattle of dishes and the sound of the fire being poked up, and Benny asking where's the tablecloth and was there another pie? By and by I was called in, and there, sure enough, the table was spread, and we were both made to sit down while the old lady skirmished around and wiped her eyes when we weren't looking.

We had beefsteak, warmed-over pigs' feet, coffee, potato cakes, fresh lettuce, graham gems and two kinds of pie, and the next day we sailed for Manila.

Them early days in the Fillypines was the toughest proposition I was ever up against. Things hadn't settled down as they did afterward, nobody knowing where he was at, and all of us shoved up to the front higgeldy-piggeldy; and being Regulars they gave us the heavy end of it, having to do all the fighting while the Volunteers was being taught the difference between a Krag-Jorgensen and a block-house. It was all front in them days—for the Regulars! But we were lucky in our commissary sergeant, a splendid young man named Orr, and we lived well from the start and never came down to rations. The Battery got quite a name for having griddle-cakes for breakfast and carrying a lot of dog generally in the eating line, and some one wrote a song, to the toon of Chickamauga, called The Fried Chicken of Battery B. But I tell you, it wasn't all fried chicken either, for the fighting was hot and heavy, and a good many of the boys pegged out. If ever there was a battery that looked for trouble and got it—it was Battery B. But we took good care of our commissary sergeant—did I mention he was a splendid young man named Orr?—and though we dropped a good many members, wounded, dead, sick and missing, we kept up the good name of the battery and had canned butter and pop-overs nearly every day.

Benny and I were chums, but nobody knows what that word means till you've kept warm under the same blanket and kneeled side by side in the firing-line. It brings men together like nothing else in the world, and it's queer the unlikely sorts that take to one another. I was so common and uneddicated that I wonder what Benny ever saw to like in me, for as I said, he was a regular mamma's boy and splendidly brought up. Religious too, and a church member! But he was powerful fond of me, and never went into action but what he'd let off a little prayer to himself that I might come out all right and go to Heaven if boloed. Pity he hadn't taken as much trouble for himself, for one day while we were lying in a trench and firing for all we were worth, I suddenly saw that look in his face that a soldier gets to know so well.

"Benny, you're shot!" I yelled out, dropping my Krag and all struck of a heap.

"Shot, nothing!" he answered, and then he keeled over in the dirt and his legs began to kick.

He took a powerful long time to die and there was even some talk of sending him down to the base hospital, the field one being that full and constantly needed at our heels. But he pleaded with the doctors and was allowed as a favor to stay on and die where he was minded—with the Battery. I was with him all I could, and I'll never forget how good that commissary sergeant was, a splendid young man named Orr, who always had a little pot of chicken broth for Benny and cornstarch, and what he fancied most of all—a sort of thick dough cakes we called sinkers. As luck would have it I got into trouble about this time—a little matter of two silver candlesticks and a Virgin's crown—and Benny sent for Captain Howard (it was him that commanded the Battery), and weak as he was and dying, he begged me off, and the captain swore awful to hide how bad he felt and struck my name off the sheet to please him. There was little enough to do in this line, for it was plain as day where Benny was bound for, and he knew himself he would never see that little house in Oakland again.

Well, he got worse and worse, and sometimes when I went there he didn't know me, being out of his head or kind of dopey with the doctor's stuff, the shadow being over him, as Irish people say. One night he was that low that I got scared and I waylaid the contract surgeon as he came out.

"Doctor," I said, "it's all up with Benny, ain't it?"

"He'll never hear reveille no more," he says.

I got my blanket and lay outside the door, it being against regulations for any of us to be in the field hospital after taps. But the orderly said he'd call me if Benny was to wake up before the end and the doctor promised me I might go in. Sure enough, I was called somewheres along of four o'clock and the orderly led me inside the tent to Benny's cot. There was no light but a candle in a bottle and I held it in my hand and bent over and looked in Benny's face. He was himself all right and he put his sweaty, hot hand in mine.

"Do you know me, old man?" I said.

"Good-by, Bill," he said, and then as I leaned over him, his voice being that low and faint, he whispered: "Billy, I guess you'll have to rustle for another chum!"

Them was his last words and he said them with a kind of a smile, like he was happy and didn't give a d——n to live. Then the little life he had left went out. The orderly looked at his watch and then wrote the time on a slate after Benny's regimental number, and the word "died." That was about all the epitaph he got, though we buried him properly in the morning and gave him the usual send-off. Then his effects was auctioned off in front of the captain's tent, a nickel for this, ten cents for that—a soldier hasn't much at any time, you know, and on the march less than a little—and five-sixty about covered the lot. There was quite a rush for the picture of his best girl, but I bought it in, along with one of his ma and a one-pound Hotchkiss shell and the hilt of a Spanish officer's sword; and when I had laid them away in my haversack and had borrowed a sheet of paper and an envelope from the commissary sergeant to write to Benny's mother, it came over me what a little place a man fills in the world and how things go on much the same without him.

I was setting down to write that letter and was about midway through, having got to "the pride of the Battery and regretted by all who knew him," when I looked up, and what in thunder do you suppose I saw? The old lady herself, walking into camp with an umberella and a valise, and looking like she always did—powerful grim and commanding. Some one must have told her the news and which was my tent, for she walked straight up to where I was and said: "William, William!" like that. She didn't cry or nothing, and anybody at a distance might have thought she was just talking to a stranger; but there was a whole funeral march in the sound of her voice and you could read Benny's death like print in her wrinkled old face. I took her out to where we had buried him, and she plumped down on her knees and prayed with the umberella and the valise beside her, while I held my hat in one hand and my pistol in the other, ready for any bolo business that might come out of the high grass.

Then we went back to the field hospital and had a look in, she explaining on the way how she had mortgaged her home so as to come and look after Benny. I guess the hospital must have appeared kind of cheerless, for lots of the wounded were lying on the bare ground, and it was a caution the way some of them groaned and groaned. You see, Battery K had just come in, having had an engagement by the way at Dagupan, and Wilson's Cavalry, besides, had dumped a sight of their men on us.

"And it was in a place like this that my boy died?" said the old lady, her mouth quivering and then closing on the words like a steel trap.

"There's the very cot, ma'am," I said.

She said something like, "Oh, oh, oh," under her breath, and taking out her handkerchief wiped the face and lips of the man in the cot who was laying there with his uniform still on him. I suppose he had got it because he was a bad case, the cot I mean, and certainly he was far from spry.

"He's dead!" said the old lady shuddering. "He's dead!"

"Orderly," I said, "number fifty-six is dead!"

The orderly bent over to make sure and then ran for his slate—the same old slate—and began to write down the same old thing. I suppose there was some sense to that slate racket, for with a little spit one slate would do for a brigade, but it seemed a cheap way to die. Then as we stood there another orderly came gallumphing in with something steaming in a tin can. The old lady took it out of his hands and smelled it supercilious.

"What do you call this?" she said.

"It's chicken broth, ma'am," he said. "That's what it is, ma'am."

"Faugh!" said the old lady. "Faugh!" and handed it back to him, like she was going to throw it away, but didn't. Then we watched him dip it out in tin cups and carry it around, while some other fellers came in and carried out the body of the man in the cot, a trooper, by his legs. We went out with them, and I tell you it was good to stand in the open air again and breathe. The old lady took a little spell of rest on a packing-case; then she gave me her umberella and valise to take back to quarters, and rolling up her sleeves made like she was going into the hospital again.

I didn't know what to say, but I guess I looked it.

"William," she said with a glitter of her gold specs.

"Ma'am," said I.

"Those boys aren't getting proper consideration," she said. "If it was dogs," she said, "they couldn't be treated worse. William, I'm going to see what one old woman can do."

"You ought to ask Captain Howard first," I said. "You don't belong to the Army Medical Corps."

"It's them that let Benny die," she said with her eyes snapping, "and as for asking they'd say 'no,' for they don't allow any women except at the base hospitals."

I knew this for a fack, but I had rather she'd find it out from the captain than from me. I didn't want to seem to make trouble for her. So while I was wondering what to do about it she headed right in, leaving me with the valise and the umberella and a kind of qualmy feeling that the old lady might strike a snag.

I didn't have a chance to come back till along sundown, but, my stars! even in that time there had been a change. Benny's mother had been getting in her deadly work and the orderlies were bursting mad, not that any of them dared say anything outright or show it except in their faces, which were that long; for, you see, the contract surgeon had taken her side and had backed her up. But they moved around like waiters who hadn't been fee'd, powerful unwilling and yet scared to say a word. The hospital had been made a new place, with another tent up that had been laid away and forgotten (you wouldn't think it possible, but it was), and the sick and wounded had been sorted over and washed and made comfortable; and where before there was no room to turn around you could walk through wide lanes and wonder what had become of the crowd. She had peeked into the cooking, too, and had found out more things going wrong in five hours than the contract surgeon had in five months. Blest if she didn't have a tally-book of the medical stores, and there was a court-martial laying for every one of the orderlies if they said Boo, for they had been making away scandalous with butter and chocolate and beef tea and canned table peaches and sparrowgrass and sardines and all the like of that, belly-robbing the boys right and left perfectly awful.

It was a mighty good account of the contract surgeon that he took it all so well and was willing to admit how badly he had been done. But he was a splendid young feller named Marcus, and what the old lady said went! He was right sorry he couldn't put her on the strength of the Battery, but the regulations kept women nurses at the base hospitals, and anyway (for we broke everything them days and there wasn't enough red tape left to play cat-and-my-cradle), Captain Howard hated the sight of a petticoat and was dead set against women anywheres. I don't know what they had ever done to him, but I am just saying it for a fack. But however it was, Marcus said the old lady had to keep out of sight or else the captain would surely send her to the rear under arrest.

Now this made it a pretty hard game for the old lady to play, and you can reckon how much dodging she had to do to keep out of the captain's sight. It was hard about her sleeping, too, for she had to do that where she could, not to speak of the pay she might have drawn and didn't, and which, sakes alive, she earned twenty times over. By and by everybody got on to it except the captain, but there wasn't such a skunk in the Battery to tell him, partly because of the joke, but most of all on account of the convalescents who naturally thought a heap of her. Then it got whispered around that she was our mascot and carried the luck of the Battery; and it was certainly remarkable how it began to change, getting fresh beef quite regular and maple syrup to burn and nine kegs of Navy pickles by mistake.

You would have thought she was too old to stand it, for we was always on the move, and I have seen her sleeping on what was nothing else but mud, with the rain coming down tremendjous. But she was a tough old customer and always came to time, outlasting men that could have tossed her in the air or run with her a block and never taken breath. But of course it couldn't be kept up for ever—I mean about the captain—and sure enough, one day he caught her riding on a gun-carriage while he was passing along the line on a Filipino pony.

"Good Lord!" he said like that, reining in his horse and looking at her campaign hat and the old gingham dress she wore. I wonder she didn't correct him for his profanity, but I allow for once she was scared stiff and hadn't no answer ready. My! But she kind of shrunk in and looked a million years old.

"Madam," said he, "do you belong to this column?"

"Unofficially I do," she said, perking up a little.

"Might I inquire where you came from?" said he, doing the ironical perlite.

"Oakland, California," said she.

"And is this your usual mode of locomotion?" said he. "Riding on a gun?" said he. "Like the Goddess of War," said he. "Perching on the belcherous cannon's back," said he.

The old lady, now as bold as brass, allowed that it was.

"Scandalous!" roared the captain. "Scandalous!"

The old lady always had a kind of nattified air, and even on a gun-carriage she sported that look of dropping in on the neighbors for a visit. She ran up her little parasol, settled her feet, give a tilt to her specs and looked the captain in the eye.

"Yes," she said, "I do belong to this column, and I guess it would be a smaller column by a dozen if it hadn't been for me in your field hospital. Or twenty," said she. "Or maybe more," said she.

This kind of staggered the captain. It was plain he didn't know just what to do. We were hundreds of miles from anywheres and there were Aguinaldoes all around us. He was as good as married to that old lady for any means he had of getting rid of her. He began to look quite old himself as he stared and stared at the mascot of Battery B, the cannon lumping along, and the old lady bouncing up and down as the wheels sank to the axles in the rutty road.

"When we strike the railroad home you go," said he.

"We'll see about that," said the old lady.

"It's disgraceful," said he. "Pigging with a whole battery," said he. "Oh, the shame of it," said he.

"Shoulder-straps don't always make a gentleman," said she.

"Holy smoke!" he said, galloping off very fierce and grand on his little horse to haul Doctor Marcus over the coals. They say the contract surgeon got it in the neck, but we were short-handed in that department already, Doctor Fenacre having been killed in action, so the captain couldn't do nothing worse nor reprimand him. It was bad enough as it was—for Marcus—for he wasn't no old lady and the captain could let himself rip. And I tell you it was a caution any time to be up against Captain Howard, for though he could be as nice as pie and perlite to beat the band—it only needed the occasion for him to unloose on you like a thirteen-inch gun.

Well, it was perfectly lovely what happened next, for with all her sassiness the old lady felt pretty blue and talked about Benny for hours, like she always did when she was down-hearted; and by this time, you know, she had got to love Battery B and every boy in it; and it naturally went against her to think of starting out all over again with strangers, and them maybe Volunteers. So you can guess what her feelings was that night when the captain went down with fever. It was like getting money from home!

The captain had never been sick in his life and he took it hard to be laid by and keep off the flies, while another feller ran the Battery and jumped his place. I guess it came over him that he wasn't the main guy, after all, and that it wouldn't matter a hill of beans whether he lived or quit. Them's one of the things you learn in hospital, and the most are the better for it; but the captain, you see, was getting his lesson a bit late. So he was laid off, with amigos to carry him or bolo him (like what amigos are when they get the chance), and the old lady give a whoop and took him in charge. My! If she wasn't good to that man, and as for coals of fire, she regular slung them at him! The doctor, too, got his little ax in, and was everlastingly praising the old lady and telling the captain he would have been a goner if it hadn't been for her! And when the captain grew better—which he did after a few days—he was that meek he'd eat out of your hand. The old lady was not only a champion nurse but she was a buster to cook. Give her a ham bone and a box of matches and she could turn out a French dinner of five courses, with oefs-sur-le-plate and veal cutlets in paper pants! It was then, I reckon, she settled the captain for good; and when he picked up and was able to walk about camp, leaning pretty heavy on her arm, she called him "George" and "my boy," and you might have taken him for Benny and she his ma.

There was nothing too good for the old lady after that, and the captain wouldn't hear of her living anywheres but at the officers' mess, where she sat at his right hand and always spoke first. The Queen of England couldn't have been treated with more respeck, and the captain put her on the strength of the Battery and she drew back pay from the day she first blew into camp. My, but it was changed times, and you ought to have seen the way the old lady cocked her head in the air and made a splendid black silk dress out of loot, which she wore every evening with the officers and rattled all over with jet. But it didn't turn her head the least bit, like for a time the boys feared it might, and she was twice as good to us as she had been before. We had a pull at headquarters now, and she had a heart that big that it could hold the officers and us, too—and more in the draw.

The tide had turned her way when she needed it most, for tough as she was she could not have long gone on like she had been. She had worn down very thin, and was like a shadow of the old lady I remembered in Oakland, California, and kind of sunk in around the eyes, and I don't believe Benny would have known her had he risen from the grave; and when anybody joked with her about it and said: "Take it easy, ma'am; you owe it to the Battery to be keerful," she'd answer she had enlisted for the term of the war and looked to peg out the day peace was proclaimed.

"Then I'll be off to join Benny," she'd say, "and the rest of the Battery in Heaven!"

There was getting to be a good crowd up there—that is, if the other place hadn't yanked them in—and some of the boys found a lot of comfort in her way of thinking.

"A boy as dies for his country isn't going to be bothered about passing in," she would say, with a click of her teeth and that sure way of hers like she knew. And I reckon perhaps she did.

One afternoon she was suddenly taken very bad; and instead of better she grew worse and worse, being tied to the bed and raving; and the captain, who wouldn't hear of her being sent to hospital, give up his own quarters to her and almost went crazy he was that frightened she was dying.

"It's just grit that's kep' her alive," I heard the doctor saying to him.

"You must save her, Marcus," said the captain, holding to him like he was pleading with the doctor for her life. "You must save her, Marcus. You must do everything in the world you can, Marcus."

THE OLD LADY, NOW AS BOLD AS BRASS, ALLOWED THAT IT WAS

The contract surgeon looked mighty glum. "She's like a ship that has been burning up her fittings for lack of coal," said he. "There ain't nothing left," he said. "Not a d——n thing," said he, and then he piled in a lot of medical words that seemed to settle the matter.

As for the captain he sat down and regularly cried. I'm sorry now I said anything against the captain, for he was a splendid man and the pride of the Battery. And I tell you he wasn't the only one that cried neither, for the boys idolized the old lady and there wasn't no singing that night or cards or anything. I was on picket and it was a heavy heart I took with me into the dark; and when they left me laying in the grass, and nobody nearer nor a hundred yards, and that behind me, I felt mortal blue and lonesome and homesick and like I didn't care whether I was killed or not. It was midnight when I went out, and I don't know what ailed me that night, for after thinking of the old lady and Benny and my own mother that was dead, and all the rest of the boys that had marched out so fine and ended so miserable—I couldn't keep the sleep away; and I'd go off and off though I tried my best not to; and my eyes would shut in spite of me and just glue together; and I would kind of drown, drown, drown in sleep. If ever a man knew what he was doing, and the risk and what I owed to the boys and me a Regular and all that—it was me; yet—yet——! And you must remember it had been a hard day and the guns had stuck again and again in the mud, and it was pull mule, pull soldier till you thought you'd drop in your tracks. Oh, I am not excusing myself. I've seen men shot for sleeping on guard and I know it's right; and even in my dreams I seemed to be reproaching myself and calling myself a quitter.

Then, just as I was no better nor a log, lying there with my head on my arm, a coward and a traitor and a black disgrace to the uniform I wore, I suddenly waked up with somebody shaking me hard—real rough like that—and I jumped perfectly terrible to think it might be the captain on his rounds. Oh, the relief when I saw it was nothing else than the old lady, she kneeling beside me all alone and her specs shining in the starlight.

"William, William!" she said, sorrowful and warning, her voice kind of strange, like she didn't want to say out loud that I had been asleep at my post; and as she drew away her hand it touched mine, and it was ice-cold. And just as I was going to tell her to lope back and be keerful of herself, the grass rustled in front of me, and I saw rising like a wall rows on rows of Filipino heads! My, but didn't I shoot and didn't I run, and the bugles rang out and the whole line was rushed, me pelting in and the column spitting fire along a length of three miles! We stood them off all right and my name was mentioned in orders and I was promoted sergeant, the brigadier shaking my hand and telling the boys I was a pattern to go by and everything a Regular ought to be. But it wasn't that I was going to tell. It was about the old lady, though I didn't learn it till the next day.

She had died at a quarter of midnight and had lain all night on the captain's bed with a towel over her poor old face.

Now what do you make of that?

OUR AMERICAN SNOBS

At a Fashionable Wedding

By JAMES L. FORD

THESE HARPIES FELL UPON THE POOR LITTLE WOMAN

FOR weeks before the Titepurse-Timpson wedding Mrs. Catnip's boarding-house was a seething whirlpool of excitement; for, as Mrs. Grinders truthfully observed, there were not many dinner-tables in the city where one could learn so much at first hand about this great hymeneal function.

Mr. Grosgrain is not usually a brilliant conversationalist; but now, feeling that the eyes of the table were upon him and that every ear was attuned to catch his lightest word, he surprised us all with the poetic imagery of his talk when the trousseau was under discussion. He it was who met Mrs. Titepurse and her daughter at the main entrance of the great establishment which claims his services, and ushered them—marching ahead himself with stately tread, his whiskers flowing behind him on either side like the foam parted by the ship's prow—down the long silk aisle, through the woolen nave, on, on past the trimmings, notions, gloves and ribbons to the broad counters where the white goods are displayed. Here he chastely left them, but only to return furtively at dusk and learn from the lips of the head saleswoman precisely what they had purchased and at what cost.

Mrs. Taffeta must have had some mysterious fountains of information, for she went out every day immediately after luncheon to return at dinner-time literally bubbling over with details of the most vital importance; while old Quillson, who rarely condescends to take part in our fashionable discussions, for once added his voice to the chorus with reminiscences of Jake Titepurse's bygone rascalities, coupled with sneering suggestions as to the many better uses to which he could put his money were he honestly inclined.

But there was no one at the table who entered into the delirious joys of these exciting weeks as did Mrs. Grinders, whose daily wont it was to absorb every detail that the combined knowledge of Mrs. Taffeta and Mr. Grosgrain could supply, and then dart off to spread the tidings among such of her friends as are less fortunately placed from a social standpoint than herself.

"My," she said to me one afternoon as we came up the steps together, "all the women I know just envy me because they say I know everything that's going on in society long before they hear of it. Well, we do hear a lot of interesting talk at Mrs. Catnip's, don't we? I've just come from a progressive euchre party in Brooklyn, and you'd oughter to have seen 'em prick up their ears when I began to talk about Kitty Titepurse and how much her wedding dress cost.

"Don't you think Mr. Grosgrain leads an awful interesting life? I should think it would be fearful fascinating to meet all these people the way he does! Why, he tells me that there isn't a day passes but what he's talking to some of the Four Hundred. They're crazy to have me bring him over to the euchre party, but to tell the truth I'd be sort of ashamed to ask him to go. They're good church people and all that, but they're not much on style, and they'd seem funny to him after all the elegant folks he meets in his business."

Strangely enough, the one person at the table who was qualified to speak of the coming event from the standpoint of an invited guest, and whose presence at the ceremony would not have been known had it not been for the hawklike eye of Mrs. Taffeta, was the only one among us who had not a word to say on the subject.

The wedding was at noon, and as I happened to lunch at home that day I heard the whole story of its splendors from the lips of Mrs. Taffeta and Mrs. Grinders, who had watched it from the sidewalk opposite the church, and had even gone out of their way while returning home to peer under the awning and gawp at the windows of the Titepurse mansion where the wedding breakfast was in progress. Mrs. Taffeta was simply livid with rage as she seated herself at the table, while Mrs. Grinders seemed stunned as if by some extraordinary discovery.

"What do you think of your friend, the widow, now?" said society's oracle as she fixed a pair of cold, gimlet-like eyes upon me. "Maybe she's not a sly, deceitful little thing, a-settin' there like puss in boots all this time and never lettin' on a word!"

For a moment the awful thought that she'd been having a wedding of her own, and with the tall Southerner as an accomplice, flashed across my mind, but before I could speak Mrs. Grinders made everything plain.

"She's heard us talkin' about the Titepurse wedding for the last four weeks and never let on that she had an invite to go herself. Of course she just went as a reporter to write up the dresses or something an' 'twant as if she was a friend of the family, but she had just as good a chance as any on 'em to see what was goin' on, an' if it hadn't been for our seein' her go up the steps of the house we never would have known she was there. You could have knocked me over with a feather when I see her traipsin' up the steps as high an' mighty as if she was a member of the Four Hundred herself."

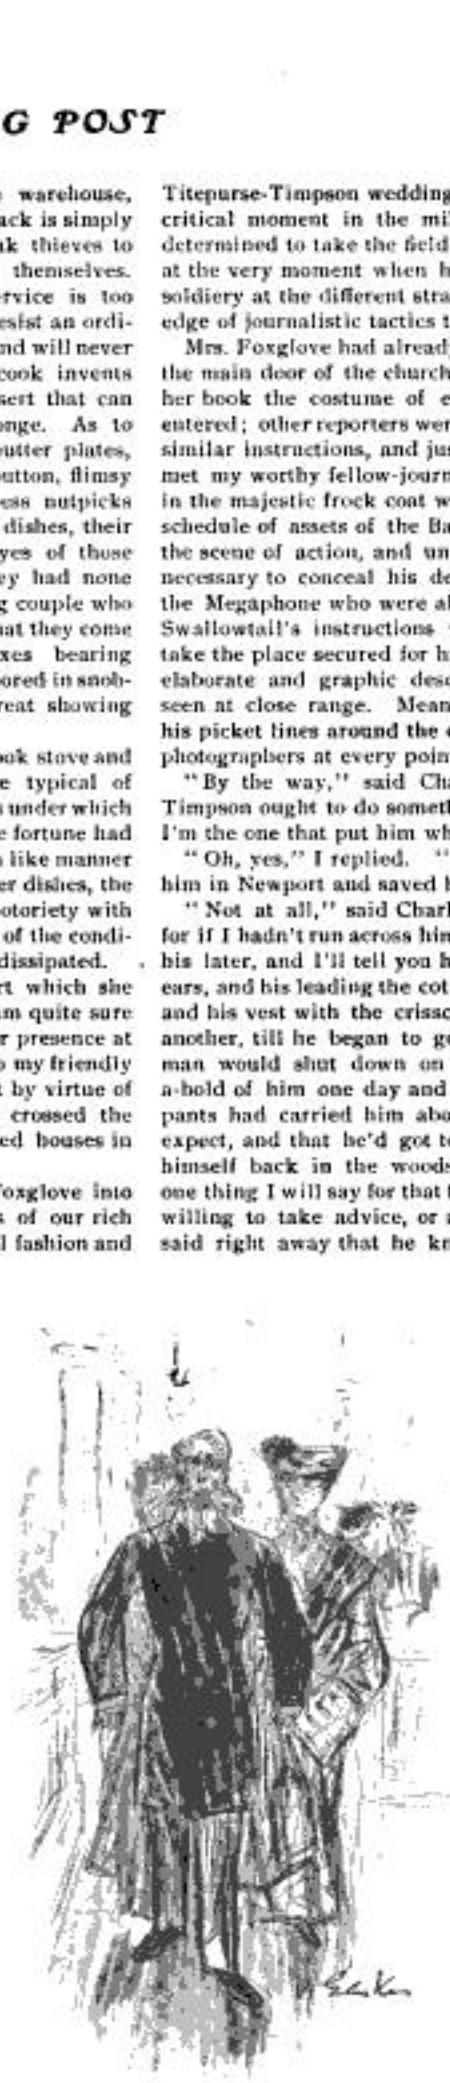
And at the dinner-table that night these harpies fell upon the poor little woman with ravenous beak and claw and literally tore from her every bit of information she could yield concerning the ceremony, the wedding breakfast, the guests and what they wore, and last, but not least, the wedding presents and their probable cost.

These last-named items brought old Quillson out of his shell and he contrasted the event of the day with the marriage of the elder Titepurses forty years ago, as described to him by one of the guests. It seems that in those days Titepurse kept a small country store in the same Connecticut village in which the mother of Kitty Titepurse found employment as a school teacher and boarded with her Uncle, Ephraim Perkins, in whose "best room" young Jacob did his courting on Sunday nights, and on Sunday nights only, the old man having given it as his opinion that the pair burnt enough wood and oil then to last through the whole week. It was in this best room that the young couple were married by the local clergyman, for which service Jacob Titepurse tendered him a fee of two dollars and a half, which he gratefully pocketed with the remark that it was two dollars more than he had expected to get, for even then the name of Titepurse was synonymous with close dealing. The most costly present received by the bride was a cook stove, given by Jacob himself, and the most disastrous, a heifer calf, presented by Uncle Ephraim, for the animal slipped her halter while the wedding was going on and contrived to make her way into the summer kitchen, where she consumed the best part of the wedding feast.

CHARLEY WAS THROWING OUT HIS PICKET LINE

But by this time Mrs. Catnip's guests were so thoroughly charged with the "style," as they called it, of this great wedding—this union of avarice and self-advertisement—that they had no ears for anything that was simple, homely and native to our soil. Indeed, it was their frenzied eagerness to learn every detail of an affair whose only importance was that which Park Row had given to it, that threw me into a serious train of philosophic thought over a form of hysteria that has killed more enjoyment of late years than any other pestilence that our country has ever known. Herod's murder of the innocents suggests itself strongly to my mind when I think of the gatherings that might be merry were it not for the sour discontent, the yearnings after the impossible and the unworthy that have been bred by this maniacal worship of the brazen calf. What was once but a simple, saucer-eyed amazement at luxury and extravagance has grown to be a spectre of envy and false shame that sits at nearly every feast.

I am sure that Mrs. Grinders was a far better woman—she was certainly much less of a fool—in the days when she found real pleasure in the meetings of the euchre party which the teachings of Mrs. Taffeta, that high priestess of the brazen calf cult, have since caused her to despise. There was not one at Mrs. Catnip's table who dared lift a voice in honor of the wise suggestion embodied in the gift with which the frugal Jacob Titepurse pointed out to his bride one of the surest roads to conjugal happiness. Not one of us gave credit to Uncle Ephraim for the far-seeing sagacity which shone like a beacon light in his gift of the heifer calf. Compare these useful and sensible presents with the trumpery that completely filled one of the rooms in the Titepurse mansion, and then tell me whether the modern calf-worshiping couple have made as good a beginning in their wedded life as did their hard-headed parents! The Planet reporters did full justice to the presents—that is to say, to the most costly of them—and became hysterical over Jake Titepurse's million-dollar check, a facsimile of which he kindly permitted them to publish; the solid gold dessert service given by Mrs. Titepurse; the solid silver hat-rack, the diamond tiaras and the massive gold rocking-chair.



WILLIAM SWALLOWTAIL

The published list of all these wonders made a deep impression on Mrs. Catnip's boarders, not one of whom seemed to realize the utter worthlessness of most of the gifts. The gold rocking-chair will have to be kept in the vaults of a storage warehouse, while the silver hatrack is simply an invitation to sneak thieves to come in and help themselves. The gold dessert service is too thin and fragile to resist an ordinary knife and fork, and will never be used until the cook invents some kind of a dessert that can be eaten with a sponge. As to the stock of silver butter plates, the size of a collar button, flimsy oyster forks, worthless nutpicks and ridiculous olive dishes, their sole merit in the eyes of those who gave them—they had none in those of the young couple who received them—is that they come in velvet-lined boxes bearing some trade-mark honored in snobdom and make a great showing for their cost.

But after all, the cook stove and the heifer calf were typical of those elder conditions under which the colossal Titepurse fortune had its beginning; and in like manner are the useless gold plates, oyster forks and butter dishes, the long ears of the bridegroom and the greasy notoriety with which Park Row crowns them all, emblematical of the conditions under which that fortune is, I hope, to be dissipated.

But to return to Mrs. Foxglove and the part which she played in the work of reporting the wedding, I am quite sure that to this day Mrs. Taffeta has no idea that her presence at the church and wedding feast was due directly to my friendly auspices in her behalf. Nor do they realize that by virtue of the place that I secured for her that she has crossed the thresholds of some of the most richly-advertised houses in the town.

Nevertheless it was I who brought Mrs. Foxglove into friendly relations with the Titepurses and others of our rich and great by securing for her a position as special fashion and society writer on the staff of my old and tried henchman, Charley Bland, the same discerning journalist who first beheld the form of Tommy Timpson looming up in the Newport fog and who is now city editor of the Planet and high in the royal favor. But although Charley "stands very close to the great white throne," as Park Row puts it, and does not scruple to dislodge from their positions any of his fellows whom he may have reason to suspect are in the enjoyment of royal favor, and therefore apt to become dangerous rivals of his own, he has a warm heart—that is to say, for a city editor—and does not forget that it was I who sent him the note of warning when he was in danger of losing his job at Newport. And so, although he well knew that it might jeopardize his position to be seen in intimate converse with one who, like myself, no longer enjoys the confidence of his sovereign, he admitted me at once to his presence when I called at the Planet office during Mr. Barshfield's absence, listened to what I had to say regarding Mrs. Foxglove, and then readily agreed to give her a fair trial in the work of reporting the great marriage that was looming upon the news horizon at that moment. Now be it known that it was not altogether with an eye single to her pecuniary betterment that I secured work for Mrs. Foxglove on the Planet. Entertaining toward her as I do feelings of respect and pity, mingled with others of surprise at her strange delusions and still others which I can scarcely define myself, and finding that not even my most fervid eloquence could uproot from her heart the absurd fetish of desirable people which she cherishes there so tenderly, I determined to put her in a position which should literally force into her mind that sense of her own folly which I had found it impossible to instill there myself. It seemed to me that when Charley Bland had fully instructed her in the Planet methods of lifting the vulgar from their native and galling obscurity to those pinnacles of fame from which they could be viewed by Mrs. Catnip's boarders, her eyes would be opened to their true status, and that she would cease to starve herself for the purpose of thrusting her little daughter into a society that she was herself helping to create.

—MARCHING AHEAD HIMSELF WITH STATELY TREAD

Bismarck arranging the terms of the surrender; de Morny planning in cold blood the coup d'État that was to place his scheming, dreaming brother on the throne; Grant investing Vicksburg—not one of these historical incidents but came into my mind when I chanced to run across Charley Bland marshalling his cohorts of reporters, photographers and fashion writers in the lobby of a hotel on the day of the Titepurse-Timpson wedding. Like Von Moltke at a certain critical moment in the military history of Prussia, he had determined to take the field in person, and I came upon him at the very moment when he was planting his well-trained soldiery at the different strategical points which his knowledge of journalistic tactics told him it was necessary to cover.

Mrs. Foxglove had already been stationed in a pew close to the main door of the church with instructions to note well in her book the costume of every woman of importance who entered; other reporters were stationed in the side aisle under similar instructions, and just as I entered the hotel lobby I met my worthy fellow-journalist, William Swallowtail, clad in the majestic frock coat which is believed to figure in the schedule of assets of the Barshfield estate, hurrying away to the scene of action, and under sealed orders, too, for it was necessary to conceal his destination from the cormorants of the Megaphone who were all on their mettle that day. Mr. Swallowtail's instructions were, as I learned afterward, to take the place secured for him in the front pew and write an elaborate and graphic description of the ceremony as thus seen at close range. Meanwhile Charley was throwing out his picket lines around the church and placing his snap-shot photographers at every point of vantage.

"By the way," said Charley, coming up to me, "that Timpson ought to do something pretty handsome for me, for I'm the one that put him where he is."

"Oh, yes," I replied. "I remember how you discovered him in Newport and saved his life, so to speak."

"Not at all," said Charley; "it was he who saved mine, for if I hadn't run across him I'd have lost my job, but I saved his later, and I'll tell you how it was. We ran him on his ears, and his leading the cotillion, and his checkerberry pants, and his vest with the crisscross pattern and one thing and another, till he began to get stale, and I was afraid the old man would shut down on him and on me, too. So I got a-hold of him one day and told him that his ears and his pants had carried him about as far into society as he could expect, and that he'd got to get a move on or else he'd find himself back in the woods, where he came from. There's one thing I will say for that fellow, and that is that he's always willing to take advice, or at least he'll take mine, and he said right away that he knew it was up to him to do something, but he didn't quite know what to do. I'd always thought that with his ears he could make a good running in what they call the intellectual set—those women won't believe in a man unless he looks queer—and I suggested getting up a lecture on Phœnician architecture, because I knew I could get hold of a collection of photographs that he could show with a magic lantern while the society people sat in the dark and held hands and listened to his gabble, but he was afraid to tackle it, and when I tell you that he asked where Phœnicia was you'll realize that he really wasn't quite up to the mark for such a job.

"'I'll tell you what's better than that,' he said; 'I'll get up a reputation for being bright and original. That seems to me to be awfully easy.'

"He's not such a fool, after all—that Timpson. So I told him to go ahead and we'd play him up on Sunday as a village cut-up. That very night he brought a live turtle to a dinner party and let it loose on the table, where it ate candy out of a silver tray and created no end of a sensation. The next morning he rolled a wooden hoop along Bellevue Avenue and came round to my place to be photographed, and gave me a list of the people that he saw on his trip and what they said to him. Then a circus came along and I put him up to giving a circus party with peanuts and red lemonade. You may remember we ran a whole page about it and described how he was putting new blood into society by his clever and original methods of entertaining. By this time he'd got so famous that the out-of-town papers began to boom him, and one woman introduced him into a novel dealing with fashionable life, in which he figured as the brightest and most original young man ever seen in Newport. It was through that novel that Mrs. Titepurse, who was making a very strong play for society, first got the idea that he would be a good son-in-law, for she thought, as nearly all these fool women do, that a man who figured so often in the papers as a cotillon

Fortunes and Freaks in Advertising

Merchants Who Have Had to be Coaxed and Bullied, and Merchants Who Have Had to Fight and Hustle Their Way into Fortunes

By Paul Latzke

IN THE harbor of New York there may be seen, now and then, a yacht so perfect in construction and so luxurious in appointment that the stranger would probably pick her out at once as "the floating home of a great prince." Her decks shine like silver, her brasses glitter like gold. Everything about her is as fresh and clean and spotless as the salt breezes, and altogether she looks like a perfect marine painting set on canvas by a master hand. The name of the yacht does not matter, but the story of her being does, for it is as romantic as the beauty herself. She was built by a man who, a few years ago, had seldom even smelled the salt breezes because he was too poor to make the trip to the seacoast from the inland city where he lived. If she were named with an eye to fitness she would be registered as the good ship Printers' Ink.

Her owner, in the early nineties, was a hard-working business man in a small way. He was past the point where he could still be called young, and success had not come, though he had worked for it hard enough. After he had tried his hand in various ways he finally settled to the manufacture of caps. In this he was no more successful than in the other things he had tried, and, finally, worn out and broken down with disappointment, he had to give up. The doctors told him that only a long rest and complete absence from worry could restore him—the usual story:

"Take a trip to Europe in a slow steamer."

"But I can't afford it."

"Then go somewhere in the country," advised the doctors as a final remedy.

The Birth of the Breakfast-Food Idea

THIS was more reasonable, but even this was tragedy, for the man felt that he must go under for good if he had to give up work. However, shattered nerves leave a man no choice. It was either the grave or rest, and the man gritted his teeth. Getting together all the money he could he wound up his small affairs and prepared for exile. Somewhere he had heard of a remarkable institution at Battle Creek, Michigan. The proprietor was known even as far as Chicago, principally because of his peculiarities. He was a Seventh Day Baptist, or "Perfectionist," and lived, according to all accounts, a simple Christian life. To-day his fame is spread throughout the Northwest, and his "peculiarities" are accepted as matters of faith, instead of evidence of "queerness." Chief among these peculiarities was the fact that he cared nothing for money-making, a heresy that was in itself enough to write him down uncanny among the hustling Chicagoans. He took pay from the people whom he received in his institution, or "sanitarium," but, instead of piling up this money in bank, as behooved a properly-balanced person, he spent it foolishly in doing good among his poor neighbors and in feeding and housing, free of charge, in his sanitarium, those who were unable to pay. No one was refused admission, and naturally the sanitarium never lacked a full company. In addition to this freaky way of doing business the doctor had other "whims." He was a vegetarian. No one in or about the place was permitted to feed on flesh. Instead, he gave his patients various cereals prepared in a way peculiarly his own. It was about this cereal idea that the whole place was built. He had worked out the processes of preparing these foods after years of experiment, and his treatment consisted almost entirely of this enforced diet. He permitted no smoking and no drinking on the part of his charges, his assistants and his employees, and all violent language and profanity were prohibited. One who offended against any of these regulations, whether he was a pensioner or the wealthiest boarder in the place, had to go.

Editor's Note—This is the third of Mr. Latzke's papers in this series. The concluding article will appear in an early number.

Altogether a queer place from the sturdy, meat-eating, free-drinking, plain-speaking Chicago standpoint. But one endures much for health's sake, and the persons admitted by the proprietor certainly regained their health. So the place was frequented, despite its peculiarities, by hosts of Chicagoans, the broken-down cap manufacturer going with the rest. His recovery was rapid, and he became at once an enthusiast on the doctor's cereal diet. Being a progressive man, he saw much good raw material going to waste, and it pained him.

"Why don't you advertise, Doctor?" he asked when his faculties were in shape again for plain thinking. "Put your cereals on the market, advertise them, and you'll make millions."

The Doctor said he'd rather not.

The Man Who Would Not Pay the Price for Millions

"I HAVE thought of it and should like the millions, for with them one could do much good in the world. But advertising and building up a great business means that I must depend largely on others, on men out in the world, of whose character and mode of life I could know nothing. In all probability there would be among them roisterers and hard drinkers, profane men and liars, and I will not engage in an enterprise that might have such agents. No, I will work here as I have always worked, and keep my establishment so that I may know that only the right-living work for and with me."

And from that standpoint the Doctor would not budge. The man finally gave up trying, but he kept his eyes and ears open, and the more he saw and heard the more he felt pain at the waste of good money-making opportunities, for he was a Chicagoan to the backbone. By and by he was cured and went back to the lake. It was not long after that a solicitor from the firm of Lord & Thomas, advertising agents in Chicago, sought Mr. Lord in his private office.

"I have just closed a good contract," said the solicitor, "with a man who wants to put a new cereal on the market. He has little or no money, but he has a good thing, and if we will give him a small credit he says he will certainly make his cereal a big winner, and give us the biggest line of advertising we have ever carried. I think he is all right."

An advertising solicitor always thinks a man who will sign a contract is "all right," so Mr. Lord was not at all affected by his agent's enthusiasm. Instead, he went to the firm's books and found that this cereal man had formerly been a cap man, and that he had carried a small account with the advertising agency during his cap days. The status of this account was so unsatisfactory that Mr. Lord declined the new contract. The solicitor sorrowfully informed his client of the decision. That gentleman, instead of accepting this action as conclusive, went on the still hunt for some advertising agent who might take a different stand from that assumed by Mr. Lord. He found him in the person of C. H. Fuller, and there was soon running a small line of advertising exploiting the new cereal. It took from the start, and so well that Mr. Fuller went in deeper and deeper with his credits. As for the former invalid, he not alone put back into more advertising every cent he received from his sales, but borrowed everywhere that he could, and only paid cash for his raw material when he couldn't get it on credit by any chance. So absorbed did Mr. Fuller and his client become in their work that almost before they knew it they were owing in the neighborhood of $150,000 to the confiding American publishers. Their attention was called specially to this fact because about this time the publishers were becoming very restive and clamoring for cash. It looked distressingly like a case of sheriff, and probably would have been. But both Mr. Fuller and his client were strong, resourceful, daring men. Instead of accepting failure and the sheriff, they made a round of visits to every publisher who was carrying their accounts and explained the situation thus:

"We owe you a large sum of money and are unable to pay at this time. Altogether we owe to you and other publishers over $150,000. If you push us all the others will jump in also, and we shall go to the wall. Then you will lose every cent we owe, for the physical assets of this business as it stands to-day amount to practically nothing. It has only the good will. This good will becomes worthless if we are forced out of existence. On the other hand, if we are allowed to continue it will grow in value every day. The turning point is in sight. The sales are increasing rapidly every day. It only requires a little more pushing to get us around the corner. Instead of forcing our hand at this time, carry our account along and give us a little more credit so that we can keep up the advertising, for to stop now would be fatal. Do this and in a short time we shall be able to pay all we owe, and carry a greater line of advertising than ever. By extending our credit you will not only get your money, which otherwise you lose, but you will create a new and profitable and permanent advertiser who will bring you a steady income."

The argument, probably because of its very audacity, won, and the tide turned as predicted, turned so hard and so fast that it poured millions into the cereal man's lap in less time than it takes the ordinary man to make thousands.

The beautiful yacht that visits New York Harbor he built only a few years ago. During 1901 he made $960,000 clear profit, and for the year 1902, though the exact sum has never been made public, he undoubtedly had an income of more than a million.

The Effect of Advertising on the Reading Public

IMPRESSIVE as these figures are, they tell only part of the story, for the result of this man's success reached far beyond his individual fortune. Stimulated by the things he accomplished, a dozen others jumped into the field, until to-day Battle Creek is more like a boom town in the oil region than a staid, respectable milling centre. There are over thirty large establishments, some of them running day and night, and all turning out hygienic foods. The population has increased by leaps and bounds and land values have risen enormously. Nor is this all. Practically the entire country has felt the stimulus which had its origin here. The farmers throughout the grain-growing belt have been enormously benefited, and naturally. For where one person used a breakfast food a few years ago there are now a hundred. Such an era of grain eating has never been seen in the world. And from all accounts it is only the beginning. The railroads have benefited and the paper-making industry has fairly jumped. First there was needed for this industry the cardboard for the packages of which millions upon millions are used. Then there were the labels and wrappers, and there was a tremendous increase in the consumption of paper to carry the advertisements, for all these cereal men jumped at once into printers' ink and on a scale unprecedented in history. A slight conception of the magnitude of this one item may be had from the experience of a single cereal concern which recently conducted an advertising campaign in which over one million dollars was spent in a period of ten months. From Battle Creek the fever of manufacturing has spread to every other milling centre in America, and from cereals it has spread to every line of foodstuffs, from foodstuffs to wearing apparel and everything else used by the people.

The effect that such advertising expenditures have had on the magazine and newspaper literature of the country is not appreciated even remotely.

It was shown recently in a legal proceeding that the output of a great concern engaged in making soda crackers had been increased thirteen hundred per cent. within a period of three years, and almost entirely this increase had come through the use of printers' ink. The business of a certain shoe manufacturing company has grown one thousand per cent. since it went into the use of printers' ink four years ago. Wearing apparel of all kinds and descriptions is now advertised on the most liberal scale, and the result, according to statistics recently compiled, has been to increase the sales in certain lines all the way from three hundred to eight hundred per cent. And this has been done without increasing the cost to the consumer or reducing the profits of the manufacturer. On the contrary, it has been the general experience that the retail prices of standard goods have been decreased on the whole, that the quality has been elevated, and that the manufacturer, through his enormously increased sales and the cutting out of the middleman, has made greater profits with less effort than ever before. The most ordinary articles of every-day consumption are being advertised, and almost invariably with success. Coffee, molasses, starch, butter, sugar, even green apples, are now presented to the consumer through the advertising columns of the magazines, and the steady growth of the number of these advertisers shows conclusively how well this new departure in commercial methods is succeeding.

The Proof that Advertising Pays

AN INTERESTING story is told of the N. K. Fairbanks Company that illustrates the change that has come to pass and the profit it has brought. For years advertising agents besieged this house to induce them to go to the consumer direct with their goods by exploiting them in the columns of the magazines and other periodicals. The campaign was earnest and persevering, but fruitless until N. W. Ayer & Son, the Philadelphia advertising agents, made a proposition that caught the fancy of the management of the house. They suggested that a belt of counties in Illinois, where the Fairbanks people did a large trade, be set aside for the experiment they proposed. In these counties the Fairbanks people were selling, through salesmen, a certain brand of soap, making a fair profit. It was proposed that the same soap be put up under another brand, and that this brand should be advertised in a conservative way in this particular section. At the same time the salesmen should continue their efforts with the old soap.

At the end of six months it was found that the new brand was outselling the old, and when a balance sheet was drawn, the net profits on the advertised soap, after all expenses for printers' ink had been defrayed, exceeded the net profits on the soap sold through the salesmen by $8000.

The experiment was conclusive, and to-day Fairbanks & Company are among the great advertisers of America, spending hundreds of thousands every year for publicity.

There seems to be no limit to the class of materials that can be sold through advertising. Ordinarily one would suppose that such a thing as black cotton dress goods lining would offer a very poor field for exploitation by the advertising artists. Yet the recent experience of a New York concern demonstrates to the contrary. A. G. Hyde & Company, one of the great dry-goods commission houses of the metropolis, had for a quarter of a century or more been selling a certain standard brand of black lining, pursuing the old-fashioned method of establishing it firmly with the jobber and retailer and leaving them to push it with the consumer, who simply asked for black lining and got this particular brand. A few years ago the firm dissolved, and two of the members organized a new house. Some one suggested that instead of going ahead in the orthodox way and building their business up by the old-fashioned method, which would take a great many years and unlimited capital, they try the new way—that they put a brand of lining on the market and build up a trade at once by educating the women through advertising to ask for this particular kind. They adopted the idea, and to-day their trade, it is said, exceeds that of the old house.

A New York manufacturer of men's furnishing goods had a similar experience with so commonplace an article as cravats. Since time immemorial almost men's cravats of the better sort have been made out of a certain kind of silk known as barathea. This particular man, to the amusement of his confrères, began, a few years ago, to advertise his make of barathea scarfs and cravats. He put a capital B to barathea, put his own name in front of the mystic word, and to-day there is not one man in a thousand who would not swear that barathea is a proper name, a coined word, and that there are no other scarfs like these to be had anywhere. The result has been that this man's business has increased at a rate unheard of in the trade, and his competitors are too much astonished to do anything more than rub their eyes. By and by a lot of them will wake up and the country will probably be flooded with scarf advertisements, to the great profit of the people manufacturing them.

It sometimes happens that advertisers have success thrust upon them in the oddest sort of way. For example:

A Little Lesson for Haughty Beginners

IN THE early seventies there was a famous firm of ship chandlers in Chicago known as G. W. Foster & Son. It was a very old house even at that time, and, feeling the need of new blood, a partner was taken in from the outside. His name was McFarren, and he had formerly been a country newspaper publisher. Naturally he was a great believer in advertising, and he had no sooner settled to his new position than he undertook to make his house advertise. The Fosters, father and son, one a man of over seventy, the other about fifty, were violently opposed to the idea, but McFarren gave them no rest. Finally then, simply to quiet him, they consented, and a note was sent to a well-known newspaper company asking them to send their advertising manager. This company printed what are known as "patent insides"—that is, sheets printed on one side with miscellany, and a limited number of advertisements, the other side being left blank for local news to be printed in by the country publishers who buy these "patent insides." McFarren had been one of the customers of this firm and had great faith in the "list," as the combined papers were called. In response to the summons a representative of the newspaper company called. The Fosters explained to him that they were going to do about $2000 worth of advertising simply to please McFarren and asked him to draw the necessary contract. A few days after the contract was signed "copy" for the advertisement was sent to the publisher's office. It was a weird piece of writing, having neither head nor tail, the only thing apparent being that G. W. Foster & Company wanted the readers of the "lists" to buy "Wilmington Pine Tar." The advertising man at once carried the copy back to the Fosters, whom he found together.

"This won't do at all," he said; "nobody can make anything of it. You had better let me help you prepare some copy that will bring results."

"What's the matter with it?" demanded Mr. Foster, the elder.

"Why, it tells nothing. All that I can make out is that it's about 'Wilmington Pine Tar,' and you don't even say what that is and what it's to be used for."

The two Fosters made no attempt to conceal their contempt.

"What," said the son sarcastically, "would pine tar be but pine tar? And every fool knows what pine tar is used for aboard ships."

"But," protested the advertising man, "our papers don't go to sailormen. Practically all of them are published in towns that lie high and dry in the interior, and not one of our readers in a thousand has ever seen even a lake schooner. They wouldn't be interested in pine or any other kind of tar."

"Well, then, they ought to, and it's that copy or nothing," declared Mr. Foster decisively. "We make more money on our 'Wilmington Pine Tar' than anything else we carry, and it's our staple. So you may take it or leave it."

Of course, the copy was taken. About six weeks later came a note from Mr. Foster, Junior, asking the advertising man to call.

"We are thoroughly disgusted with our advertising experiment," Mr. Foster said before his caller could fairly sit down. "We haven't had even a single inquiry."

"Of course you haven't. I told you you wouldn't. Our people have no use for 'Wilmington Pine——'"

"Well," interrupted Mr. Foster, waving that foolish question aside, "we want to cancel our contract. Of course, we know we are legally bound for the whole sum, but we want to know what bonus you will accept to call the advertising off as it stands."

The advertising man tried again to explain that the wrong line had been picked out for advertising, but Mr. Foster cut him short again.

"We're tired of the whole thing, I tell you. It's a nuisance and a failure. Now, what will you take to call it off?"

This exasperated the advertising man.

"Publishers are no pirates, Mr. Foster," said he. "They don't want to carry advertising that does not pay the man who orders it. I took your foolish tar ad simply because I thought you'd be reasonable later and advertise some of the other goods you carry that our people would buy. But if you won't you won't, and we will cancel your contract."

"And what bonus do you ask?"

"Bonus? No bonus. We don't hold people up for money. You pay pro rata for what you've used and let that end the matter."

Mr. Foster was astounded and made no attempt to conceal it. He thought that advertising men were like lightning-rod men, their aim being simply to get all the money possible. This way of doing was unexpected, and he mellowed so that it became possible to explain the science of advertising and the hopelessness of offering pine tar to people who didn't even know there was such a commodity except as they had read of it in their family Bibles.

"I'll tell you what I'll do," continued the advertising man after this much was made clear. "We'll call this contract off, but in order that you may learn what real advertising will do, I'll make this proposition:

"You carry a side line of awnings, rope, horse covers, grange regalia, flags and a lot of other things our readers use. We are just completing a new building. You equip that building with awnings, and we'll give you enough advertising space to pay for the work. But let me write your advertisements."

The deal was made on this basis, and as a starter an advertisement was run of the firm's outfit of grange regalia. Instantly the orders began to pour in and the house soon had the largest trade in the country in grange regalia, flags, horse covers and the other things required by the farmers and others who read the country weeklies. The house continued to advertise heavily until the business was wound up owing to the death of all the partners.

The Temperance Man Who Knew Human Nature

BUT if careful wording, judicious display, the full worth of the goods are generally held to be necessary in all advertising, medicine is one thing that will sell and pay to advertise regardless of its value. Anything else to be successfully exploited through printers' ink must have substantial merit, so that a man who buys once will continue as a purchaser, but a medical preparation may be advertised with profit, regardless of its capacity to do the things promised. This is due in the first place to the enormous margin of profit in patent medicines, the bottles that carry them costing generally more than the mixture itself, and in the second place to the endless army of patent medicine "fiends" that exists in the world. These people will go right on buying every new cure-all that comes along. The story of a preparation known in its day as Vinegar Bitters illustrates this peculiarity. This preparation was originally put on the market under another name by a California doctor. He was a temperance man of the firmest conviction. He made up his mind that the great success achieved by a number of brands of bitters then on the market could be duplicated by a Temperance Bitters, something that, unlike the others, should not be based on alcohol. So he put up a big stock, sent it out to the jobbers and began to advertise. It took about three months to work up the demand, and then to the temperance man's horror it was found that all the stock he had put out had fermented and soured, so that it was all thrown back on his hands. There are still alive to-day persons who tasted this stuff, and they are unanimous in saying that nothing more awful was ever put into the human mouth. But the doctor was a shrewd judge of human nature, and he knew that there are millions of people in this world who don't believe they are getting a real curative medicine unless it tastes bad, and the worse the taste the greater the faith. So he recorked and relabeled his fermented mixture and put it out again under the new name of "Vinegar Bitters," the "vinegar" to show people that the dreadful sour taste was all right and called for in the bill. He advertised it from the Pacific to the Atlantic, never put out new stock until it had soured good and hard, and for years sold it by the hundred thousand gross, making millions.

CHAPTER V

CRANE was in nowise disappointed at the sensation his published letter made. The justice of his position was at once apparent. But it was equally apparent that he was making a serious break in the political dykes which held the party together in his State against the ocean of the party opposed to it. Under Senator Bicknell's rule insubordination had gradually crept in. The late landslide, which had elected a Congress in opposition to the party in power, increased the importance of States like Crane's, where the balance of power shifted about every ten years between the two parties. Senator Bicknell, in the seclusion of his boudoir—for such was his luxurious den in reality—tore his hair and used all of the expletives permissible in polite society. In a week or two Governor Sanders, without any further newspaper controversy, appointed to the vacant Senatorship Mr. Michael Patrick Mulligan, a gentleman of Hibernian descent, who had made a vast fortune out of manufacturing pies by the wholesale, and who cherished an honorable ambition to legislate for the hated Saxon. Senator Bicknell, Crane and everybody in the State knew of Mr. Michael Patrick Mulligan, who was commonly called Mince Pie Mulligan. He was a ward politician of the sort peculiarly unhampered by prejudices or principles, who bought and sold votes by wholesale, very much as he bought and sold pies. He was totally without education, but by no means without brains, and proposed to himself a seat in the Senate as an agreeable diversion, without the least idea of doing anything beyond voting as directed by "the boss"—for so he designated the Senator who was chairman of the National Committee of Mr. Mulligan's party. It was, on the whole, about as harmless an appointment as could be made. Mulligan's private life was perfectly clean, and he was known to have an open hand for charity, and never to have forgotten a friend. It gave both Senator Bicknell and Crane a breathing spell, and they were willing enough to put up with Mince Pie Mulligan until the first of January.

Senator Bicknell, although easy enough in his mind about Mulligan, was far from easy about Crane, who had gone up like a rocket, but showed no disposition to come down like a stick. The Senator got into the way of stealing over to the House, "just to see how things are going"—in reality to see how Crane was going—and it scared him to observe how Crane was making good his footing everywhere. His first triumph, even after substracting Thorndyke's assistance, had been a real triumph. Following hard on this came his controversy with the Governor, in which he clearly had the best of it. The shrewd men in his party saw that in the readjustment of allegiances Crane must be counted, and the chairman of the National Committee said as much to Senator Bicknell when the two discussed the war between the Governor and Representative Crane. When the chairman said that, Senator Bicknell felt as Henry IV of England felt when he saw the Prince of Wales trying on the crown before the looking-glass.

Meanwhile, Thorndyke was speeding West, and after a week's absence he turned Eastward again, escorting Annette Crane and her two children to Washington, as he had suggested to Crane. Annette, being acute, as most women are, in affairs of the heart, knew the very first time Thorndyke mentioned Constance Maitland that he was in love with her. When he said that he had known her long ago, on Lake Como, and proceeded to describe the beauty of those Italian days and nights, Annette Crane was convinced that it was in those sweet hours that Thorndyke had first loved Constance Maitland. Women have no conscience in probing the love affairs of men, reckoning them the common property of the sex, and while Thorndyke was blithely unconscious that he had revealed anything, Annette was in full possession of all the essential facts. Also, Thorndyke let out that Crane knew Constance Maitland. Crane had never mentioned Constance's name to his wife. That was in itself enough to give Annette a painful interest in this woman who, as Thorndyke said, could charm the birds off the bushes.

When the train came bumping into Washington, on a pleasant May afternoon, Crane was waiting at the station. He seemed delighted to meet his family again, and indeed, on seeing them, a kind of tenderness came over him. He kissed his children affectionately, to which they submitted. Just behind them was a shabby one-armed man, whom a girl of ten was hugging and kissing with little gurgles of delight. Crane wished that his children had met him like that.

He thanked Thorndyke warmly for taking care of Annette, who said a few words of earnest thanks, and gave him a smile that meant much more. The children bade him good-by with outspoken regret, and would not be comforted until Thorndyke promised to take them to the Zoo the next Sunday to see the baby elephant.

As the party came out of the station together a handsome little victoria whirled by. In it sat Constance Maitland, her delicate mauve draperies enveloping her, a black lace parasol shading her head, and a filmy white veil over her face. By her side sat a little, withered old lady in rusty black—one of the flotsam and jetsam of weary old people who drift to Washington to die. It was one of Constance Maitland's pet charities to take these weary old people to drive, and in so doing to wear her loveliest gowns, her most exquisite hats—a delicate compliment unfailingly appreciated.

She did not see Thorndyke and the Cranes as they walked out of the station, but both men saw her. Annette Crane had abundant confirmation of her hypothesis about Thorndyke. His clean-cut but rather plain features became almost handsome as he watched the passing vision of the woman he loved. Of far more interest to Annette was Crane's countenance. It was full of expression, and he was totally untrained in controlling it. There was in his eyes a strange and complex look, which Annette interpreted instantly to mean, "You are the type of woman I most admire and to whom I most aspire." It struck her to the heart—but unlike Crane, she had acquired an admirable composure which made her mistress of herself. She was glad, however, that Constance had not seen her first after two days of hard travel.

When the Cranes had reached the suburban villa where Crane lived a number of letters and dispatches were awaiting him. Two or three men, Hardeman among them, came out that evening to see him. From them Annette found out the great struggle in which her husband was engaged. He had scarcely mentioned it to her.

Not a word of inquiry or reproach from her followed. When Crane, however, alluded to the great fight some days afterward he was a little staggered to find that Annette knew as much about it as anybody. A study of the newspaper files at the National Library had enlightened her.

Thorndyke did not see Constance for some days after his return—that is to say, he did not show himself to her. But he resumed his nightly prowl in her neighborhood—a practice ridiculous or pathetic according to the view one takes of an honorable and sensitive man, whose honor stands between him and the love of his life. On the third day, though, he had his recompense, for, strolling through the beautiful but unfashionable Smithsonian grounds, he met Constance Maitland driving, and in response to a timid request on his part she took him in the victoria, and they had a delicious hour to themselves under the great, overhanging elms and lindens.

SENATOR MINCE PIE MULLIGAN

She showed a truly feminine curiosity about Annette Crane, whom Thorndyke praised unstintedly, and when he asked Constance to call on Mrs. Crane, Constance replied that she already intended to do so. Indeed, a few afternoons later Constance drove out to the Cranes' suburban villa, but Mrs. Crane was not at home. Constance was disappointed; her curiosity to see Crane's wife was unabated. Ten days afterward, on a warm afternoon, Constance sat in her cool drawing-room, fresh in its summer dress of linen covers, bead portières, and shaded by awnings, waiting for her carriage. Mrs. Crane was announced. The first impression that Constance got of Annette Crane was that she was exquisitely dressed. Her gown was a delicate pale blue muslin, her hat a white straw trimmed with white ribbons. Both gown and hat were of her own creation and the whole outfit had cost less than ten dollars—but not the greatest man-milliner in Paris ever turned out anything more becoming to Annette's simple and natural beauty than she herself had evolved from the "Emporium" at Circleville. The daintiness and freshness of it were charming, and when in moving she accidentally displayed a snowy, lace-edged petticoat, this daintiness and freshness were emphasized.

Never in her life had Annette looked forward to a visit with the same dislike as this one. But by some magic of thought and feeling, the instant she came face to face with Constance Maitland, Annette Crane knew she had a friend. In a moment she was at ease. Like a woman of the world in the best sense, Constance at once found something in common to talk about, and the two sat in the friendliest conversation possible, each singularly pleased with the other.

Seeing Constance dressed to go out and the victoria standing at the door, Annette, after paying a short visit, rose to go, and with more reluctance than she had thought possible.

"If you are returning home, perhaps you will allow me to drive you out?" said Constance affably, and Annette accepted without any demurs.

Seated together in the carriage the conversation between the two turned on Thorndyke. Annette expressed frankly the deep regard she had for him, and described her efforts to keep the children from annoying him, while Thorndyke, from simple tolerance of them at first, had become an accomplished child-spoiler and destroyer of parental discipline. Constance spoke of Thorndyke as frankly and without the least embarrassment, but Annette, who had surmised very readily where Constance stood in the regard of the two men, one of them her own husband, had little difficulty in settling to her satisfaction that Miss Maitland had a particular regard for Mr. Thorndyke.

After driving for three-quarters of an hour along a suburban road they came to the cottage where the Cranes had established their quarters. It was near six o'clock, and Crane had returned early from the Capitol. He was sitting on the veranda reading to Roger and Elizabeth when Constance Maitland's carriage drove up.

Since the meeting with his children and noting their perfectly respectful but perfectly evident indifference toward him, Crane had received a blow where he least expected it. He was surprised at the degree to which it affected him. Their laughing eyes, suddenly growing demure on his approach, haunted him amid the hurly-burly of debate and in long conferences on his political future. Impelled by all the natural impulses, Crane determined to try to win his children's hearts, and as a beginning he had come home early from the House that day, bringing with him a book to read to them. The reading had been a success, and in the midst of it Crane looked up and saw the victoria approaching with his wife and Constance Maitland in it. He rose at once and walked down the shady path to where the carriage stood. The children, hand in hand, followed after, blowing kisses to their mother.

Crane was so possessed with the idea that Annette, as a native of Circleville, must be far inferior to Constance that he had a shock of surprise when he saw the two women actually compared, and realized that Annette was by no means cast into the shade. Constance was conscious of this, but good-naturedly wished Annette to have the benefit of it.

Crane talked pleasantly with Constance for a few minutes, Annette still sitting in the carriage. He was certainly remarkably handsome, as the declining sun shone on his clear-cut olive face, with the little rings of dark brown hair showing on his forehead. Constance thought the Cranes the handsomest couple she had seen for a long time. The children were introduced, behaved well—as American children seldom do—and then Constance said to Annette:

"I shall soon be closing my house for the season, but before doing so I shall hope to have you and Mr. Crane to dinner with me some evening."

"We will come with pleasure," replied Annette; and a day was set for the following week.

Constance returned to town, thinking to herself what a fool Crane must be not to be satisfied with such a wife as Annette.

CHAPTER VI

ON THE evening of the dinner there was to be a belated reception at the White House in honor of an international commission which had just opened its sittings in Washington, and it was arranged that the dinner should be somewhat early, that the whole party, being invited to the White House, might adjourn there.

The rest of the guests were assembled in Constance's drawing-room before the Cranes arrived. Crane himself always looked superbly handsome in evening clothes, and Annette's appearance was scarcely inferior in another way. As on her first meeting with Constance, Annette gave the impression of being exquisitely gowned. A simple white crêpe, cut low, showed off her beautiful arms and shoulders, and a few moss rosebuds in their green leaves gave the needed touch of color to her costume. Simplicity is always the last form of elegance to be attained, and Annette Crane had attained it. There was no mistaking the fact that she made a most agreeable impression—that every man present admired her, and every woman present liked her. Crane felt like rubbing his eyes and pulling his ears. Was this his submissive Annette? He half expected her to call attention to the fact that he had been rather dull at the dinner, but although Annette knew it quite as well as he did she forebore to mention it.

When they reached the White House there was the usual crowd of carriages, their lamps twinkling like myriads of stars in the soft spring night, the roar of horses' hoofs upon the asphalt, the crowds of gayly-dressed women in evening gowns disembarking at the north portico, the blare of music from the red-coated band within the corridors. Constance Maitland, on Sir Mark le Poer's arm, and followed by her dinner guests, presently found herself shaking hands with the President and bowing to the line of ladies of the Administration which extended across the oval reception-room.

When she reached the point whence ingress is had to that select region known as "behind the line" she was invited with Thorndyke to join the elect. The President himself had stopped Crane for a word with him, and on having Mrs. Crane presented had promptly invited her behind the line. This was partly due to the white crêpe gown.

In the general mix-up that followed in the hallowed spot Constance found herself one of a group near Mrs. Hill-Smith on the arm of the British Ambassador, and Eleanor Baldwin and the Honorable Edward George Francis Castlestuart-Stuart. Close by were Mrs. James Brentwood Baldwin and Mr. James Brentwood Baldwin, and Mr. James Brentwood Baldwin was gravitating toward the Secretary of State who loomed large at hand.

Drifting toward the Secretary and Mr. Baldwin was a very odd-looking object, whom Thorndyke whispered to Constance was Senator Mince Pie Mulligan. These three got into conversation, very languid on the part of the Secretary and Mr. James Brentwood Baldwin, but very strenuous on the part of Senator Mince Pie Mulligan. A part of Mr. James Brentwood Baldwin's coyness came from the fact that he and Senator Mulligan were old acquaintances—a fact which Mr. Baldwin had no disposition to brag about.

The new Senator had a head of blazing red hair which was as good as a stove on a cold night. He might have stepped bodily from the pages of the comic weeklies as regarded his contours, but his small light-blue eye glittered with humor and shrewdness, while his great slit of a mouth, which divided his face fairly in the middle, had lines of both sense and kindliness. He was enjoying himself hugely and was not afraid to let anybody see it. Not so Mr. James Brentwood Baldwin or the Secretary of State—but a Senator is a Senator to the Secretary of State, and Secretary Slater had in mind other treaties to be laid before the Senate, and so was fairly civil to Senator Mulligan. Mince Pie, himself, was much struck by the appearance of Eleanor Baldwin, who was easily the handsomest woman present, except her mother, but although Mr. James Brentwood Baldwin owned up that Eleanor was his daughter, he made no move to introduce Senator Mulligan to her.

However, the situation was not so easily to be elided; Mrs. Baldwin approached the group, and at sight of her Mr. Mulligan held out his hand, and a broad smile carried the corners of his mouth back to his ears.

"Why, Nora Hogan," he cried, "it's good for sore eyes to see you. I haven't seen you before for twenty-five years. Jim Baldwin didn't tell me, just now when I was talking with him, that you were here, an' didn't introduce me to his daughter, though I gave him some pretty broad hints. Sure, you know Mike Mulligan, who was clerk in your father's store thirty years ago?"

"Certainly I do, Mike," responded Mrs. Baldwin, calmly and sweetly, offering her hand.

"A better man than your father, Dan Hogan, never lived," proclaimed Mr. Mulligan, addressing the circle, "an' it's the trainin' I got with him that's made my fortune. 'Dale square, Mike,' Dan Hogan would say—he had a beautiful brogue on him—'an' give the widders an' the orphins the turn of the scale whin you're sellin' 'em sugar an' starch an' such.' An' I've done it, Nora, in memory of good old Dan Hogan."

Mrs. Baldwin's face grew softer and softer as Mr. Mulligan proceeded. She was so great a lover of charity and had such beautiful humility of spirit that the idea of her father's example having moulded a man into a like charity gave her the deepest gratitude and pleasure.

But not so Eleanor, or Mr. James Brentwood Baldwin, who now appeared hovering on the edge of the group. Eleanor, her face very pale, fixed her eyes on Senator Mulligan with a haughty stare which he perfectly understood and resented. A gleam shot into his eye which showed that he meant to pay her back for her insolence. Mr. Baldwin, in the most acute misery, practiced the goosestep and tried to stem the tide of Senator Mulligan's eloquence.

"Er—ah—eh—Mr. Mulligan, your compliments to the late Mr. Daniel Hogan are very much appreciated by me as well as Mrs. Baldwin, especially as I recall with pleasure—what an—er—important—er—factor you were in the commerce of our native place. For myself, business has no real charm for me," continued Mr. Baldwin, turning to the British Ambassador. "I have been reasonably successful, but my taste always lay in the way of books. I live among my books."

Up to this time Mr. Mulligan had spoken with a very fair Irish accent, but now he chose to lapse into the most luxuriant brogue that ever grew on the green sod of Erin. This was accompanied with a wink to Constance, which gave her extreme enjoyment, and a nudge in the Ambassador's ribs, which he did not in the least resent.

"Faith, an' it's the way yez always was, Jim Baldwin," cried Mince Pie Mulligan. "Whin you an' me was luggin' the buckets of butter an' jugs of the most iligant molasses to th' cushtomers, it was you, Jim Baldwin, as was always a-savin' yer tin cints to buy a book. An' when yez was a-coortin' Dan Hogan's pretty daughter, ye'd actually mourn over the ice cream yez filled her up wid bekase it wasn't books wid a gilt bindin'!"

At this point Mr. Mulligan squared himself off and distributed a general wink around the circle, including Eleanor, who glared at him like a basilisk. Mrs. Hill-Smith felt acutely for her dear Eleanor, but being secretly consumed with curiosity about antecedents as new to her as they were to Constance Maitland could not forbear remaining. A relentless fate seemed to direct Senator Mulligan's tongue, and turning to her the Senator said cheerfully and without the least encouragement:

"An' I'm tould ye're the granddaughter of Cap'n Josh Slater, that I knew like me ould hat when I was but a laad an' he Cap'n of the River Queen, one o' the floatin' palaces of the day."

Mrs. Hill-Smith trembled a little, but answered coldly:

"I think you must have been misinformed."

"Well, hardly," responded Senator Mulligan blithely, "since it was your own father as tould me not half an hour ago. I knew th' ould man well—an' an honest ould cuss he was, but for tobacco chewin' an' bad whisky ye'll not find his match bechune here an' the lakes o' Killarney. He knew how to turn th' honest pinny though, did ould man Slater. No givin' of widders an' orphins the turn of the scale, nor the turn of a hair neither—he was out for the last rid cint. He was a good-looking ould chap when he was washed up an' had on a clean shirt. And now I'll say I think you're like him—raymarkably like him—an' it's up to you to prove that he wasn't your grandfather, begorra!"

Had a bomb with a burning fuse dropped at Mrs. Hill-Smith's feet she couldn't have been more astounded. She looked from Mince Pie Mulligan's laughing face to Eleanor Baldwin's, and then glanced helplessly around the circle. It was impossible not to see that, though Ambassadors are not supposed to laugh, the British Ambassador had abandoned all hope of keeping serious. Constance was laughing frankly, Thorndyke was in quiet convulsions, Castlestuart-Stuart and Senator Mulligan were exchanging sympathetic grins—and then Eleanor Baldwin said with the air of an offended queen:

"Papa, give me your arm."

This Mr. James Brentwood Baldwin, with a heightened color, did—but not before Senator Mulligan genially remarked:

"Well, the best of frinds must part, so here's good-by an' good luck to yez, Jim Baldwin; an' I'll say to you, Miss Baldwin, I hope ye'll live an' die as honest as ould Danny Hogan, your grandfather, an' a better man never stepped shoe-leather." And then turning to Mrs. Hill-Smith, "I commind to you th' example of your grandfather, Cap'n Josh Slater, that I had the honor of knowin' an' who always got what he wanted an' was an agreeable man enough, barrin' the bad tobacco an' mean whisky."

With these words Senator Mince Pie Mulligan bowed himself off, leaving a great trail of social devastation behind him.

THE LITERARY SENSE

The Obvious—By E. NESBIT

HER EYES WERE SHINING WITH THE EXCITEMENT OF THIS FESTIVAL

HE HAD the literary sense but he had it as an inverted instinct. He had a keen perception of the dramatically fitting in art, but no opposing vision of the fitting in life. Life and art, indeed, he found from his earliest years difficult to disentwine, and later impossible to disentangle. And to disentangle and disentwine them became at last the point of honor to him.

He first knew that he loved her on the occasion of her "coming-of-age party." His people and hers lived in the same sombre London square: their Haslemere gardens were divided only by a sunk fence. He had known her all his life. Her coming of age succeeded but by a couple of days his return from three years of lazy philosophic study in Germany, and the sight of her took his breath away. In the time-honored cliché of the hurried novelist—too hurried to turn a new phrase for an idea as old as the new life of spring—he had left a child: he found a woman. She wore a soft, satiny-white gown that showed gleams of rose color through its folds. There were pink hollyhock blossoms in the brown of her hair. Her eyes were shining with the excitement of this festival of which she was the goddess. He lost his head, danced with her five times, and carried away a crumpled hollyhock bloom that had fallen from her hair during the last Lancers through which he had watched her. It was not till, alone again at his hotel, he pulled out the hollyhock flower with his ball program that he awoke to a full sense of the insipid flatness of the new situation.

He had fallen in love—was madly épris, at any rate—and the girl was the girl whose charms, whose fortune, whose general suitability as a match for him had been dinned into his ears ever since he was a callow boy at Oxford, and she a long-black-silk-legged, short frocked tomboy of fourteen. Every one had always said that it was the obvious thing. And now he had, for once, done exactly what was expected of him, and his fine literary sense revolted. The worst of all was that she seemed not quite to hate him. Better, a thousand times better, that he should have loved and longed and never won a smile from her—that he should have sacrificed something, anything, and gone his lonely way. But she had smiled on him—undoubtedly she had smiled—and he did not want to play the part so long ago assigned to him by his people. He wanted to be Sidney Carton. Darnay's had always seemed to him the inferior rôle.

Yet he could not keep his thoughts from her, and for what was left of the year his days and nights were a restless see-saw of longing and repulsion—advance and retreat. His moods were reflected in hers, but always an interview later—that is to say, if he was cold on Tuesday, she on Thursday would be colder. If on Thursday he was tender, Sunday would find her kind. But he, by that time, was frigid. So that they never, after the first wildly beautiful evening when their hearts went out to each other in a splendor of primitive frankness, met in moods that chimed.

This safeguarded him. It irritated her, and it most successfully bewitched them both.

His people and her people looked on, and were absolutely and sadly convinced that—as her brother put it to his uncle—it was "no go." Thereupon a certain young-old cotton-broker appearing on the scene and bringing gifts with him, her people began to put pressure on her. She loathed the cotton-broker and said so. One afternoon every one was by careful accident got out of the way and the cotton-broker caught her alone. That night there was a scene. Her father talked a little too much of obedience and of duty; her mother played the hysterical symphony with the loud pedal hard down—and next morning the girl had vanished, leaving the conventional note of farewell on the pincushion.

Now the two families being on all counts close allies had bought jointly a piece of land near the Littlestone golf links and on it had built a bungalow, occupied by members of either house in turn, according to any friendly arrangement that happened to commend itself. But at this time of the year folk were keeping Christmas season dismally in their town houses.

It was on the day when the cotton-broker made his failure that the whole world seemed suddenly worthless to the man with the hollyhock bloom in his pocketbook, because he had met her at a dance and he had been tender—but she, reflecting his mood of their last meeting, had been glacial. So he lied roundly to his people, and told them that he was going to spend a week or two with an old chum who was staying up for the vacation at Cambridge, and, instead, he chose the opposite point of the compass, took train to New Romney, and walked over to the squat one-storied bungalow of the sea. Here he let himself in with the family latch-key, and set to work with the help of a box from the stores, borne behind him with his portmanteau on a hand-cart, to keep Christmas by himself. This at least was not literary. It was not in the least what a person in a book would do. He lit a fire in the dining-room, and the chimney was damp and smoked abominably, so that when he had fed full on tinned meats he was fain to let the fire go out and to sit in his fur-lined overcoat by the becindered grate, now fast growing cold, and smoke pipe after pipe of gloomy reflection. He certainly laid to heart the old advice to put that in his pipe and smoke it. He put everything in his pipe and smoked it. The cursed countenance which his people were ready to give to the match that he couldn't make—her maddening indecisions, his own idiotic variableness. The lamp began to smell vilely and he blew it out, and did not light candles because it was too much trouble. So the early winter dusk had deepened into night. And the bitter north wind had brought the snow, and it drifted now in feather-soft touches against the windows.

He thought of the good warm dining-room in Russell Square—of the gathering of aunts and uncles and cousins, uncongenial perhaps, but still human, and he shivered in his fur-lined coat and his icy solitude, damning himself for the fool he knew he was.

And, even as he damned, his breath was stopped and his heart leaped at the sound, faint but unmistakable, of a key in the front door. If a man exists not too remote from his hairy ancestors to have lost the habit of the pricking ear he was that man. He pricked his ears, so far as a modern man may, and listened.

The key grated in the lock—grated and turned—the door was opened—and banged again. Something was set down in the little passage, set down thumpingly and wholly without precaution. He heard a hand move along the partition of match-boarding. He heard the latch of the kitchen door rise and fall—and he heard the scrape and spurt of a struck match.

He sat still. He would catch this burglar red-handed.

Through the ill-fitting partitions of the Jerry-built bungalow he could hear the intruder moving recklessly in the kitchen. The legs of chairs and tables grated on the brick floor.

He took off his shoes, rose, and crept out through the passage toward the kitchen door. It stood ajar. A clear-cut slice of light came from it. Treading softly in his stockinged feet he came to it and looked in. One candle, stuck in a blue saucer, burned on the table. A weak blue and yellow glimmer came from some sticks in the fireplace.

Kneeling in front of this, breathless with the endeavor to blow the damp sticks to flame, crouched the burglar. A woman. A girl. She had laid aside hat and cloak. The first sight of her was like a whirlwind sweeping over heart and brain. For the bright brown hair that the candle-light lingered in was like her dear brown hair, and when she rose suddenly and turned toward the door his heart stood still, for it was she—her very self.

She had not seen him. He retreated—in all the stillness his tortured nerves allowed—and sat down again in the fur coat and the dining-room. She had not heard him. He was, for some moments, absolutely stunned, then he crept to the window. In the poignant stillness of the place he could hear the heavy flakes of snow dabbing softly at the glass.

She was here. She, like him, had fled to this refuge confident in its desertion at this season by each of the families who shared a right to it. She was there—he was here. Why had she fled? The question did not want to be answered—it sank before the other question. What was he to do? The whole literary soul of the man cried out against either of the obvious courses of action.

"I can go in," he said, "and surprise her, and tell her I love her, and then walk out into the night and leave her alone here. That's conventional and dramatic. Or I can sneak off without her knowing I've been here at all—and leave her to spend the night unprotected in this infernal frozen dog-hutch. That's conventional enough, Heaven knows. But what's the use of being a reasonable human being with free-will if you can't do anything but the literarily and romantically obvious."

Here a sudden noise thrilled him. Next moment he drew a long breath of relief. She had but dropped a gridiron. As it crashed and settled down with a rhythmic rattle on the kitchen flags the thought flowed through him like a river of Paradise: "If she did love me—what an hour and what a moment this would be!"

Meantime she, her hands helpless with cold, was dropping clattering gridirons not five yards from him.

Suppose he went out to the kitchen and suddenly announced himself. How flat—how obvious! Suppose he crept quietly away and went to the inn at New Romney.

How desperately flat! How more than obvious!

Suppose he—but the third course refused itself to the desperate clutch of his drowning imagination, and left him clinging to the bare straw of a question. What should he do?

Suddenly the really knightly and unconventional idea occurred to him, an idea that would save him from the pit of the obvious, yawning on each side of him.

There was a bicycle shed, where also wood was stored, and coal and lumber of all sorts. He would pass the night there—warm in his fur coat and his determination not to let his conduct be shaped by "what people in books would have done." And in the morning—strong with the great renunciation of all the possibilities that this evening's meeting held—he would come and knock at the front door—just like anybody else—and—Qui vivra verra. At least he would be watching over her rest, and would be able to protect the house from tramps.

Very gently and cautiously, all in the dark, he pushed his bag behind the sofa, covered the store box with a Liberty cloth from a side table, crept out softly, and softly opened the front door—it opened softly, that is; but it shut with an unmistakable click that stung in his ears as he stood on one foot on the snowy doorstep struggling with the knots of his shoelaces.

The bicycle shed was uncompromisingly dark and smelt of coal sacks. He found a corner, between the coals and the wood, and sat down on the floor.

"Bother the fur coat," was his answer to the doubt whether coal dust and broken twigs were a good down-setting for that triumph of the Bond Street art. There he sat, full of a chastened joy at the thought that he watched over her—that he, sleepless, untiring, was on guard, ready, at an instant's warning, to spring to her aid should she need protection. The thought was mightily soothing. The shed was cold—the fur coat was warm. In five minutes he was sleeping peacefully as any babe.

When he awoke it was with the light of a big horn lantern in his eyes and in his ears the snapping of wood.

She was there—stooping beside the heaped faggots, breaking off twigs to fill the lap of her up-gathered blue gown; the shimmery silk of her petticoat gleamed greenly. He was partly hidden by a derelict bicycle and a watering-can.

He hardly dared to draw breath.

Composedly she broke the twigs. Then like a flash she turned toward him.

"Who's there?" she said.

An inspiration came to him—and this at least was not flat or obvious. He writhed into the darkness behind a paraffine cask—slipped out of his fur coat and plunged his hands in the dust of the coal.

"Don't be 'ard on a pore cove, mum," he mumbled, desperately rubbing the coal dust on to his face; "you wouldn't go for to turn a dawg out on a night like this, let alone a pore chap outer work."

Even as he spoke he admired the courage of the girl. Alone, miles from any other house, she met a tramp in an outhouse as calmly as though he had been a fly in the butter.

"You've no business here, you know," she said briskly. "What did you come for?"

"Shelter, mum—I won't take nothing as don't belong to me—not so much as a lump of coal, mum."

She turned her head. He almost thought she smiled.

"But I can't have tramps sleeping here," she said.

"It's not as if I was a reg'lar tramp," he said, warming to his part as he had often done on the stage in his A. D. C. days. "I'm a respectable working-man, mum, as 'as seen better days."

"Are you hungry?" she said. "I'll give you something to eat if you'll come to the door in five minutes."

He could not refuse—but when she was gone into the house he could bolt. So he said:

"Now may the blessing! It's starving I am, mum, and on Christmas Eve."

This time she did smile: it was beyond a doubt. He had always thought her smile charming. She turned at the door and her glance followed the lantern's rays as they pierced the darkness where he crouched.

The moment he heard the house door shut he sprang up, lifted the fur coat gingerly to the wood-block. Flight, instant flight! Yet how could he present himself at New Romney with a fur coat and a face like a collier's? He had drawn a bucket of water from the well earlier in the day—some would be left—it was close by the back door. He tiptoed over the snow and washed and washed and washed. He was drying face and hands with a pocket handkerchief that seemed strangely cold and small when the door opened suddenly, and there close by him was she, silhouetted against the warm glow of fire and candles.

"Come in," she said; "you can't possibly see to wash out there."

Before he knew it her hand was on his arm, and she had drawn him in to the warmth and light.

He looked at her—but her eyes were on the fire.

"I'll give you some warm water and you can wash at the sink," she said, closing the door and taking the kettle from the fire.

He caught sight of his face in the square of looking-glass over the sink.

Was it worth while to go on pretending? His face was still very black. She evidently had not recognized him. Perhaps—surely she would have the good taste to retire while the tramp washed, so that he could take his coat off? Then he could take flight—and the situation would be saved from absolute farce.

But when she had poured the hot water into a bowl she sat down in the chair by the fire and gazed into the hot coals.

He washed.

He washed till he was quite clean.

He dried face and hands on the rough towel. He dried them till they were scarlet and shone. But he dared not turn around.

There seemed no way out of this save by the valley of humiliation. Still she sat looking into the fire.

As he washed he saw with half a retroverted eye the round table spread with china and glass and silver.

"As I live—it's set for two," he told himself. And in an instant jealousy answered once and for all the questions he had been asking himself since August.

"Aren't you clean yet?" she said at last.

How could he speak?

"Aren't you clean yet?" she repeated, and called him by his name. He turned then quickly enough. She was leaning back in the chair laughing at him.

"How did you know me?" he asked angrily.

"Your tramp voice might have deceived me," she said; "you did do it most awfully well. But you see I'd been looking at you for ages before you woke!"

"Then good-night," said he.

"Good-night?" said she; "but it's not seven yet!"

"You're expecting some one," he said, pointing dramatically to the table.

"Oh, that," she said; "yes—that was for—for the poor man as had seen better days. There's nothing but eggs—but I couldn't turn a dog from my door on such a night—till I'd fed it!"

"Do you really mean——?"

"Why not?"

"It's glorious!"

"It's a picnic."

"But?" said he.

"Oh—well! Go if you like!" said she.

It was not only eggs. It was all sorts of things from that store box. And never had any picnic been so gay. He told her that he had been bored in town and had sought relief in solitude. That, she told him, was her case also. He told her how he had heard her come in and how he had hated to take either the obvious course of following her to the kitchen, saying "How do you do?" and retiring to New Romney, or the still more obvious course of sneaking away without asking her how she did. And he told her how he had decided to keep watch over her from the bicycle shed. And how the coal-black inspiration had come to him. And she laughed.

"That was much more literary than anything else you could have thought of," said she; "it was exactly like a book. And oh—you've no idea how funny you looked."

They both laughed and there was a silence.

"Do you know," he said, "I can hardly believe that this is the first meal we've ever had alone. It seems as though——"

"It is funny," she said, smiling hurriedly at him.

He did not smile. He said: "I want you to tell me why were you so angel-good—why did you let me stay? Why did you lay the pretty table for two."

"Because we've never been in the same mood at the same time," she said desperately, "and somehow I thought we should be this evening."

"What mood?" he asked inexorably.

"Why—jolly—cheerful," she said with the slightest possible hesitation.

"I see."

There was another silence. Then she said in a voice that fluttered a little.

"My old governess, Miss Pettingill—you remember old Pet? Well, she's coming by the train that gets in at eight. I wired to her from town. She ought to be here by now——"

"Ought she?" he cried, pushing back his chair and coming toward her—"ought she? Then, by Heaven, before she comes I'm going to tell you something——"

"No, don't!" she cried. "You'll spoil everything. Go and sit down again. You shall. I insist. Let me tell you! I always swore I would some day."

"Why?" said he, and sat down.

"Because I knew you'd never make up your mind to tell me——"

"To tell you what?"

"Anything—for fear you should have to say it in the same way some one else had said it before."

"Said what?"

"Anything! Sit still! Now I'm going to tell you."

She came slowly round the table and knelt on one knee beside him, her elbows on the arm of his chair.

"You've never had the courage to make up your mind to anything," she began.

"Is that what you were going to tell me?" he asked, and looked in her eyes till she dropped their lids.

"No—yes—no; I haven't anything to tell you, really. Good-night."

"Aren't you going to tell me?"

She hid her face in her hands. "There isn't anything to tell," she whispered.

"Then I'll tell you," said he.

She started up, and the little brass knocker's urgent summons resounded through the bungalow.

"Here she is!" she cried.

He also sprang to his feet.

"And we haven't told each other anything!" he said.

"Haven't we? Ah, no—Don't! Let me go—— There she's knocking again. You must let me go!"

He let her slip through his arms.

At the door she paused to flash a soft, queer smile at him.

"It was I who told you, after all!" she said. "Aren't you glad. Because that wasn't a bit literary."

"You didn't. I told you," he retorted.

"Not you!" she said scornfully. "That would have been too obvious."

"SIT STILL! NOW I'M GOING TO TELL YOU"

To the Last Letter of the Law

A MAN who had been cashier of a Western bank came into the Post-Office Department recently as a clerk.

In the course of his new duties he was required to write official letters of acknowledgment concerning the business that came over his desk.

He took his first batch of letters to First Assistant Postmaster-General Wynne. They were all alike and began: "Dear Sir: Your favor of the 15th inst. received and contents noted. In reply I beg leave to state——"

"Here," said General Wynne, "this will not do. In Government letters of this kind you must not use the personal pronoun. The Government is impersonal. You must rewrite those letters."

"All right," answered the clerk, "I understand."

Some time later he came back with the new lot and laid them confidently on General Wynne's desk, saying: "Those are correct, I think. I have used no personal pronouns."

He had written: "Dear Sir: Your favor of the 15th inst. received and contents noted. In reply beg leave to state——"

Our Factory of Americans

TWENTY-ONE years ago we touched high-water mark in immigration, with three-quarters of a million arrivals. It looks as if that tremendous record would be beaten this year. In one day in April more than ten thousand immigrants landed at New York—the greatest day's work in the history of that port. One steamer brought 1341 Scandinavians, another nearly 1400 Italians, another almost 1600 Greeks, Italians, Arabs, Turks and Persians, a fourth over 2800 Poles and other Slavs, a fifth 270 Scotchmen, a sixth 525 Greeks, Turks and Arabs, and a seventh nearly 2600 Germans. In the first eleven days of April 41,200 immigrants of all nationalities invaded Ellis Island.

No wonder some of our kind friends across the Atlantic, looking at this appalling mixture, believe that we never can turn its varied ingredients into Americans. No such gigantic amalgamation of diverse races has ever been attempted since Caracalla made Roman citizens of all the inhabitants of his empire, and we may say that never in the history of the world has such an undertaking been successfully consummated.

But that does not prove that we shall fail. Indeed, there is every reason to believe that we shall succeed. We have been peculiarly fortunate in our preparation for the mighty work that is reversing the catastrophe of Babel. We have been a composite people from the beginning. The Thirteen Colonies were settled by Englishmen, Scotchmen, Scotch-Irish, Irish, Dutchmen, Swedes, Germans, Frenchmen and Negroes. Before the Revolution substantially all these, except the Negroes, had been welded into one homogeneous people, with a common language and common political ideals. For fifty years after that this people increased and solidified with little admixture from immigration, so that when new currents began to flow from Europe it was prepared to absorb them. It was a quarter of a century later still before the first great flood broke upon us. That deluge was Irish. In the fifties the problem of immigration was regarded as an Irish problem. The Know-Nothing protest was an anti-Irish movement. Irishmen captured our city governments, and our foreign policies were swayed by the prejudices of the "Irish vote."

But gradually the Irish freshet subsided, to be succeeded by a German stream. A quarter of a million German immigrants entered the country in a single year. German newspapers, theatres and churches sprang up and flourished. Had this continued there might have been some reason to fear that the Kaiser's dream of a huge, alien German colony in the United States would be realized. But it stopped in good time. Meanwhile the earlier Irish immigrants and their children had become thorough Americans, and were helping the original Americans to assimilate the Germans. The work was successfully accomplished, and now the Irish and Germans both are parts of that wonderful solvent that is Americanizing the newer arrivals.

We are receiving a good many Italians, Poles, Hungarians and Russian Jews at present, but it will be many years before their numbers compare with those of the Irish and Germans who have been already successfully assimilated. And by that time no doubt the stream will slacken, as the former streams have done. Meanwhile the races that have produced Marconi and Tesla will still further enrich a stock which the mixture of blood has made already the richest in the world.

The Bogey Man Banished

THE murders and uncleaner crimes which fill the papers every day are so much alike that they are apt to pall on us. Considered as literature the heroes are too commonplace. We are surprised to find that the man who banged his friend's head to a jelly the other day, or put strychnia in his coffee, bought his clothes from our own tailor and is known to our own chums as a clever, amusing fellow.

Are we really all then cut from the same cloth? Even the judges on the bench seem to confuse the sheep and the goats. One complimented a murderer the other day as a good father and a useful citizen—and what is more, he told the truth; and another, when a shameless woman calmly told the whole country how, day after day, she had disgraced her innocent daughters, condoled with her upon her "heavy sorrows."

Our fathers dealt in no such compliments. The judge put rue and tansy between him and the prisoner during the trial to ward off contagion from body and soul, and at the end recounted his crimes, held him up as a monster to the world, and put on the black cap while he prayed to God to have mercy on his soul.

An old chronicle of Newgate tells us how a murderer's dead body was placed standing on a high black car with his bloody clothes and ax, and, escorted by regiments of soldiers, all the police and bands of music, was drawn through the massed streets, stopping at last where Drury Lane intersects the Strand. There a deep pit was dug and the quartered body, with a stake driven through the heart, was lowered into it amid a roar of execration from all London.

There was no mincing matters as to the character of that fellow!

Does our modern change of attitude come from our growth in charity or simply from our better knowledge of ourselves? We have begun to find out that we are all like the Centaur, part man and part brute.

We begin to see, too, that most ill-doing is the result not of any abnormal, monstrous vice in us, but of virtues grown rank and poisonous. A flower run rampant kills the soil as much as any weed. The miser is at first only wisely prudent: the spendthrift only generous: passions which end in divorces and murders come into the lives of men who in their boyhood were more affectionate and impulsive than their fellows.

We all, if we have any mother wit, have found this out, and hence we have almost ceased to teach our boys of little fenced-in roads to little fenced-in heavens belonging to our own little sect, with all the rest of God's children shut out.

But we show them Smith in the dock and Pratt on the gallows and say, "You, too—but for the goodness of God and the power of fight that is in you."

Why Not a Naval Merger?

WHEN Nelson kidnaped the Danish fleet at Copenhagen he was seizing an instrument of war of European importance. When the combined squadrons of England, France and Russia destroyed the Turkish fleet at Navarino they were attacking a force that counted for something in international politics. When Prussia and Austria waylaid Denmark in 1864 the Danes had command of the sea. As lately as 1877 the Turks were stronger than the Russians on the Black Sea, and even after that Greece aspired to be a naval power.

But now the little countries are dropping out of the naval game. It is becoming too rich for their blood. Only the greatest Powers can afford it, or rather stand it, for the greatest of them cannot really afford it. A single modern battleship would pay for the entire fleet with which Nelson won Trafalgar. The entire revenue of Turkey, out of which the Sultan must pay all the expenses of his government, including the cost of maintaining his numerous family, is almost precisely the amount of this year's appropriation for the United States Navy. The cost of the British navy would support the government of Spain and leave a handsome margin for additional stealings. The whole Chinese Empire is run on a good deal less than the cost of the American navy.

Twenty years ago Italy had the third fleet in the world. Her naval strength surpassed that of Russia or Germany. Now she has politely cashed in her chips and withdrawn from the table. Chile and Argentina once had stronger fleets than ours. Now they have agreed to stop building and their new ships are for sale. Japan still thinks herself a great naval power, but the financial pace is too hot for her, and she will have to drop out. Practically Great Britain, France, Russia, Germany and the United States form a Naval Trust. In a few years any one of them will be a match at sea for all the other countries of the world combined.

It is a widely accepted maxim of economics that where combination is possible competition is impossible. Now that the number of competing establishments in the naval business has been so reduced, it seems as if the next development would be a "gentlemen's agreement" to stop a cutthroat rivalry. With battleships quoted at $7,500,000 apiece, one ship all round and two for England means an outlay of $45,000,000, with the relative strength of the Powers left precisely where it was before the money was spent. It seems as if it ought not to be impossible for statesmanship to find a way of avoiding that futile expenditure. Chile and Argentina have done it. Their naval rivalry was recently as acute as that of any two of the Great Powers, and relatively even more expensive, but they managed to tame it. If, instead of being named Great Britain, France, Russia, Germany and the United States, the maritime Powers were called Morgan, Rockefeller, Hill, Vanderbilt and Harriman, they would probably contrive to get around a table and agree upon some "administrative economies" to the general benefit of their bank accounts.

The Royal Incubus

ONE of the advantages of living under a republic is that there is nobody whose movements the illustrated papers are absolutely compelled to exploit. It is true that the President of the United States is a good camera subject, especially when he is as picturesque a character as Mr. Roosevelt, but editors have some little latitude even in dealing with the President. In England the movements of the King and the royal family are peremptorily "must" in the office of every weekly periodical, and no matter what London picture-paper you pick up you may count on finding at least a third of the illustrations devoted to illustrious faces with which you are already reasonably familiar.

In its issue of April 11, for instance, the Illustrated London News gave up the whole of its first page to a view of "King Edward's Visit to Lisbon. His Majesty and the King of Portugal Landing from the State Barge at Block House Square." The next illustrated page was filled with a picture of "The Ancient Portuguese Royal Barge, Bearing King Edward and Dom Carlos from the Yacht to the Shore." A double page centrepiece threw a number of sidelights on the visit, and another half-page reproduced some Roman antiquities presented to the Queen of Portugal.

The Graphic, of the same date, was equally copious in its attentions to the royal visit, and it had the special enterprise to illustrate "His Majesty's Bedroom," "The King's Sitting Room," and "The Reception-Room" in the Portuguese palace. Presumably the views of "His Majesty's Pajamas" were fogged on the plates.

Now, His Majesty King Edward VII (or I, as the Scotch will have it) is a tolerably well-known personage. Even a Central Office detective could recognize him anywhere on sight. And "His Majesty Visiting Dom Carlos of Portugal" is not noticeably different in appearance from "His Majesty Laying the Cornerstone of the Dunfermline Institute for Destitute Paretics," or "His Majesty and the Countess of Warwick at Ascot," or "His Majesty Shooting Pheasants at Balmoral," or "His Majesty Decorating Private Finerty of the Enniskillen Fusileers," or "His Majesty Breaking the Bank at Tranby Croft." Consequently a prolonged course of English illustrated papers inevitably produces a sensation of monotony. Three pictures of His Majesty a week—a very low average—make 156 a year, or 1560 for ten years. In one sense the system is easy for the editors, if hard on the subscribers, for all they have to do is to keep in stock views of two or three suits of civilian clothes and all the military and naval uniforms in Europe, and one-third of the space in their papers is provided for. But when things of importance are happening in the world—and in this revolutionary age things of considerable moment are happening all the time—it is a little annoying to have the space available for live topics cut down to make room for royal fashion plates.

MEN and WOMEN

COLONEL HARRY HALL, of Pittsburg, the writer and orator, likes the prairie and goes West every summer. During his trip last year he was overtaken by night in a little village in Nebraska. He stayed at the local hotel. In the morning he wanted to take a bath and consulted the landlord about it.

The landlord shouted back to the kitchen: "Hey, Jim, this here gent wants to take a bath. Bring the fixin's."

Soon afterward a boy appeared carrying a cake of yellow soap, a towel and a pickax.

"What's the pickax for?" asked Hall.

"Why," said the landlord, "you'll have to dam up the crick."

His Identity Established

FRANK N. DOUBLEDAY, the New York publisher, is tall and broad-shouldered. He was rushing from the ferry the other day when a suave person, wearing a silk hat and exhibiting other signs of prosperity, approached him and said: "Why, how do you do, Mr. Williams? I am glad to see you again. How are all the folks?"

"Heavens," thought Doubleday, "after living in New York for twenty years I am about to be buncoed."

Then he smiled and replied affably: "I think you are mistaken. My name is not Williams."

"Can it be?" inquired the man with the silk hat. "The resemblance is marvelous. May I ask what is your name?"

Doubleday straightened himself to his full height. "Of course," he said. "It is no secret. My name is Tom Thumb."

Only as Old as He Felt

SENATOR EDMUND W. PETTUS, of Alabama, is eighty-two and the oldest man in the Senate. His predecessor was Senator Pugh. During Pugh's fight for reelection Mr. Pettus, then a lawyer in Selma, went to see Pugh about getting an appointment as judge.

"Pshaw, Pettus," said Pugh loftily, "you are too old to be a judge."

Pettus stood and looked at Pugh for a minute. Then he announced with great deliberation: "Well, if I am too old to be a judge I am not too old to be a United States Senator."

He wasn't, either, for he went out and defeated Pugh and took the Senatorship himself.

No man could be so wise as Pettus looks, but his looks belie his wisdom but little, at that. He is learned in the law and especially well versed in the Bible and Shakespeare. Somebody asked him where he got it all.

"When I was a young fellow, in 1849," he said, "I rode on horseback from Selma to California. I had a Bible and a Shakespeare in my saddle-bags and I read them when I was jogging along and when I was in camp. They were the only companions I had and I haven't forgotten them."

The Sultan's Private Cooler

FREDERICK W. HOLLS, the New York lawyer who was secretary to the American Commission to the Peace Conference at The Hague, tells of a call he had one morning during the conference from three Turks. They were fine-looking fellows. The spokesman was Rustem Bey and the others were different sorts of Beys.

They came to enlist Mr. Holls and the commissioners from the United States in the cause of the Young Turks. They said the Sultan of Turkey is a usurper. They proclaimed, with much intensity and many gestures, that the real Sultan had been imprisoned for fifteen years.

"Ah," said Mr. Holls, thinking to relieve the situation somewhat, "he's in the cooler, is he?"

The Turks did not understand. Mr. Holls was forced to make a long explanation that in this country a man who is in prison is sometimes referred to as being in the "cooler." The Turks were much interested in this strange phrase.

Later in the day one of the English commissioners met Mr. Holls. "By the way, Holls," he said, "did you receive a call from some Young Turks this morning?"

"Yes," Holls replied.

"They came to see me, too," the Englishman continued. "Most extraordinary people. Why, they told me the real Sultan has been imprisoned for fifteen years in an ice box."

The Correspondent's Revenge

WHEN Alfred Henry Lewis, the author, was a correspondent at Washington for a Missouri paper he had a difficulty with Governor Dockery, who was then a member of the House of Representatives.

Lewis cast about for a suitable revenge. After thinking about the matter for some days he wrote an innocent paragraph for his paper which said that Mr. Dockery, who is a rich man, had decided to give a large portion of his wealth to the various churches of Missouri, and had begun by sending checks for $500 to churches in St. Joseph and Kansas City.

Then he sat back and waited. Dockery was begging for mercy in less than a week. Every church in the State, almost, had written for its share. Lewis printed another paragraph saying that Mr. Dockery's contributions would not be made for some years, and since that time Dockery has been scrupulously polite.

A Qualified Assent

SENATOR ALLISON, of Iowa, has the reputation of being the most cautious man in public life. He takes no chances, but always qualifies his statements. His letters are marvels. During the past session of Congress the Senator read to Senator Hale a letter he had written on a subject in which Senator Hale was also interested.

"What will he think of that?" asked Allison.

"I don't think he will get much out of it," Hale replied.

"I didn't intend he should," chuckled Allison.

This incident led an Iowa man to tell the story of the rash citizen of Dubuque who once made a bet he could force Senator Allison to answer "Yes" to a direct proposition.

Half a dozen friends went along to see the miracle performed. They entered Allison's office and chatted on various topics. Presently a flock of sheep, newly sheared, came by.

"Those sheep have just been sheared, Senator," said the man who had made the bet, winking at his companions.

Senator Allison gazed earnestly at the sheep. Then he replied softly: "It looks like it on this side."

Julius Cæsar Up to Date

ONE of the famous orators of Texas was Colonel Tol Bonie, an unlettered genius, who had much language at his control and few facts.

Bonie referred to the assassination of Julius Cæsar in one of his speeches. This is what he said of that historic incident:

"One beautiful summer day when Julius Cæsar was walking down the streets of Spain, happy and free from care, along came Brutus and snuck up behind him with stealthy tread. Then Brutus drew his bowie knife and plugged it into the immortal ribs of Julius Cæsar, and that grand man, completely taken by surprise, turned on Brutus and in tones of thunder said: 'Is that you, Brutus, you dirty dog?'"

A Question of Technicalities

ONE of the results of the Populist movement in the West a few years ago was the election of a man named Kirby to the House of Representatives. Kirby had violent ideas about money. He could talk for hours on the financial question.

During Kirby's first term a bill came up for discussion which had to do with the issuing of a new series of paper money and the retirement and maceration of the series then in use.

Kirby was furious about this. "Here we see the Government, directed from Lombard Street in London, withdrawing billions of money from circulation and macerating it, whatever that is," he shouted in a speech one day. "Never in the history of the United States has such an outrage been perpetrated. With our children crying for money these creatures of the Wall Street octopus are withdrawing billions from circulation, billions, gentlemen, I say billions——"

"Don't you mean millions?" asked Representative Culberson.

"There you go," yelled Kirby, shaking his arms in the air, "there you go; just like all the rest of them, you are trying to win this fight on technicalities."

The Last Appeal

SOMETIMES the dignity of the United States does not appeal to the newcomer in Washington. A bumptious young secretary to a Senator strolled into the court room on decision day. He took a seat inside the railing, in one of the chairs reserved for the lawyers who are privileged to practice before the court.

The marshal saw the stranger and sent him a note which read: "Are you a member of the bar?"

The young secretary read the note and smiled a scornful smile. He sent to the marshal a card which proclaimed him to be the secretary of Senator So-and-So.

This did not impress the marshal, for a doorkeeper led the young man, protesting vigorously, to the corridor.

"Now, see here, sonny," said the doorkeeper. "You just think it over. That's the Supreme Court and you don't want to raise no row. Suppose you get in contempt. There ain't nobody left to appeal to but the Lord."

Special Counselors in Busine

By FORRES

ELIMINATION of waste is the vital element in every line of business effort. No business executive who fails to give this problem his best thought has any fair claim to be held as keeping pace with the spirit of the age. Serious, profound and conscientious study of the science of business system — which is but another name for the art of eliminating waste — is the demand placed upon every man in a position of business responsibility. If he is alert, progressive and capable he will respond to this demand. If he is suffering from the "creeping paralysis" of over-conservatism, or any other contracting influence, he will plod along in the old rut and score a failure, or at best a meager and qualified success.

Under the acute pressure of modern competition, a full and fair success is no more possible to the man of business who does not apply himself consistently to the problem of eliminating waste from every line of his activities than it is possible for the Electrical Engineer to succeed who ignores all the achievements of electrical science in the last two decades.

Mail and Filing Room

An Age of Specialists: And this comparison provokes the pertinent point that this is also the age of specialization. Possibly this suggestion may impress you as trite and commonplace; but you will lose the keynote to the universal tendency of the hour if you allow the familiarity of the saying to hide its intense and practical significance. It has a direct and important bearing upon the business of every man who has a shadow of authority or responsibility in the world of affairs. When the man who "plays a thinking part," whose activities are to some degree administrative, learns that he cannot know everything that he needs to know about his own business without getting help from the outside specialists he has mastered the biggest element of success in modern business methods.

This leads directly to the conclusion of the whole matter: Because the elimination of waste is the big problem in the shop, the factory, the store, the office and the bank; and because the men who direct these lines of business cannot possibly think out and work out for themselves all the waste-eliminating devices that make for economy and progress, the profession of the Consulting Engineer in Business System has been called into being. Doubtless the Science of Business being has not had so significant a development since the Italians of the Middle Ages devised the first system of double entry bookkeeping as the upspringing of this new profession. Call its members "business experts," "business systematizers," "expert methodizers," "business counsels," or whatever you choose; the service which they perform is best suggested by the title of Consulting Engineers of Business, and their work centers in one common purpose: the elimination of waste, the conserving of time, energy and material.

School Room

A Model Office Under Modern Methods: I can conceive of nothing more intensely interesting to the alert, progressive and thoughtful business executive than an investigation of any institution where the work of a representative member of this important profession is exemplified in every detail of method and equipment. Probably there is no better place to observe the practical workings of the highly developed business system than in the offices of Baker-Vawter Company, the largest organization of Consulting Engineers of Business in the world.

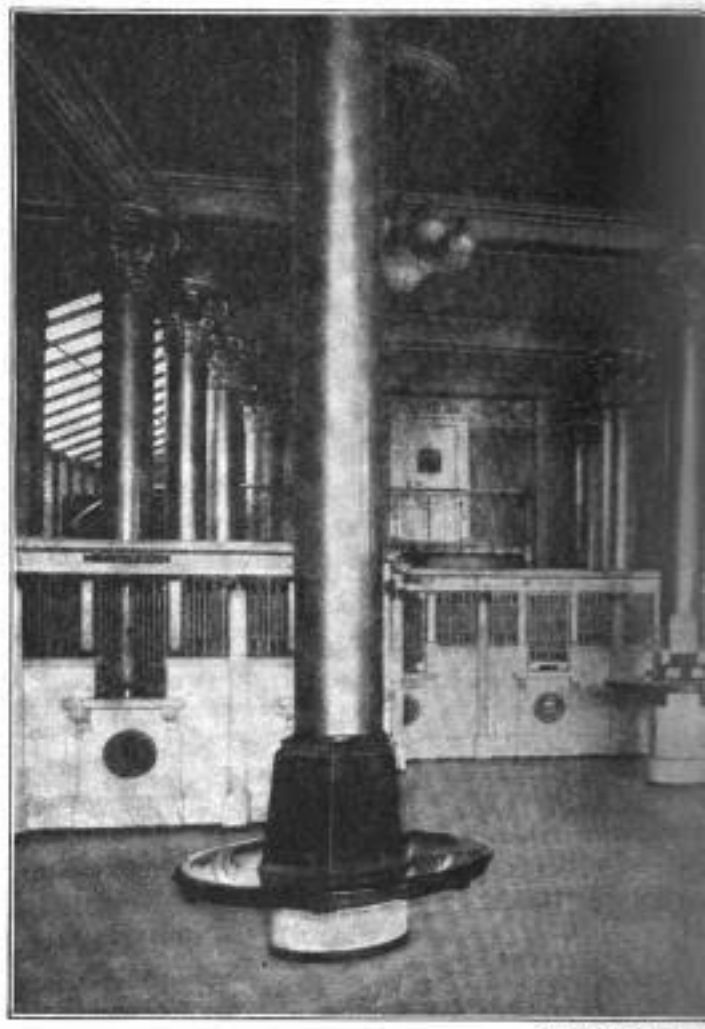
Speaking from the viewpoint of a searching personal investigation of this remarkable establishment, I am compelled to admit that the business man who desires to get a comprehensive view of what the Science of Business System has attained in the third year of the Twentieth Century need not go beyond the offices of these foremost members of the most important of the new professions.

Clearest of all the impressions which a visit to this establishment will leave upon the mind of the observer is that of convincing sincerity, due to the fact that this firm consistently practices what it preaches. In every department, and to the last detail, it shows the practical operation of the principles and methods which it advocates and devises for others.

"You are at liberty," declared the young man who piloted me through this interesting place, "to consider the methods you see in operation here as typical and representative of those of which Baker-Vawter Company is the exponent. But you will fail to get a true perspective if you do not keep constantly in mind the fact that every business, and every business house, must be individually treated; that the general principles which you see in operation here must be adapted to the special needs of each institution which we serve. Always the personal equation must be considered, and this matter of individual adaptation is one of the most difficult and perplexing problems that test the skill of the specialist in business system."

At once I was led to the heart of the house: the room into which centers the vast and unceasing currents of incoming and outgoing correspondence, and where every item of this epistolary tide is filed for reference according to a system representing the acme of simplicity and convenience. Instantly the eye catches the significance of the office arrangement, noting that the mailing and filing room is located in the very center of the establishment, surrounded by rooms in which the various branches and departments are operated. The general accounting room and the city sales departments are the first arteries through which flow the vital current of the house correspondence. Then follow the offices of the Treasurer, the General Sales Manager, the President, the Vice-President and other members of the executive staff.

About the walls of this central room runs a low deep wainscoting of vertical filing cases of severely artistic design — cases capable of holding 540,000 letters, and of the sectional construction which admits of indefinite expansion. Standing at the big, square table in the center is the master of the mailing room, swiftly scanning the contents of the envelopes opened by the young boy who assists him.



Here, again, I caught a keynote of modern business system: one good man for each thinking part, and inexpensive help for the subordinate duties which proper system reduces to the simplicity of a mechanical routine. An instant's glance at the letter in his hand is sufficient to analyze it, to determine to what department, official or clerk it should first be assigned. That officials shall not be burdened with mail that should go to their subordinates is his constant care. Then, too, he must always be on the alert for those communications demanding "rush" attention, and his tact and diplomacy are often called into use in the discreet handling of mail of a personal and semi-personal character. A seemingly slight oversight on the part of this man at the heart of things may easily create delay, friction and confusion. But, so swiftly does he do his exacting work of analysis and distribution, that he handles an average of fully 1500 pieces of mail, incoming and outgoing, each day. Under old methods not fewer than six clerks would be required to do the work which one man and a boy now perform in the mail and filing room of Baker-Vawter Company.

How 50,000 Accounts are Handled: A single step takes the investigation into the adjoining office of the general accounting department. Here, as everywhere in the thoroughly modern office, flat desks are the order.

"Here," explained my guide, "is done the entire general accounting for a business operating four large factories and eighteen branch establishments and employing a regular force of seventy-eight salesmen. We serve and maintain trade relations with more than 50,000 customers in the year, and yet there is not a single ledger in the place — at least not in the old sense of the term."

"How is this done?" I inquired.

"By the elimination of every detail of accounting that possibly can be dispensed with consistent with absolute safety and accuracy. Under the old system we would require at least nine people to take care of this volume of accounts now handled with far greater facility by three young women. This is possible only under a method which cuts out every process and detail not positively essential to live accounting. Bookkeeping and accounting of the old regime were practically a chain of copying processes, with all the useless multiplication of labor and of opportunities for errors which those processes involved. Now there is not, we believe, a single unnecessary repetition of a description or a detail. Such is the perfection to which the loose leaf system is now reduced!"

The Federal Trust Co

Practical Points of Office Administration

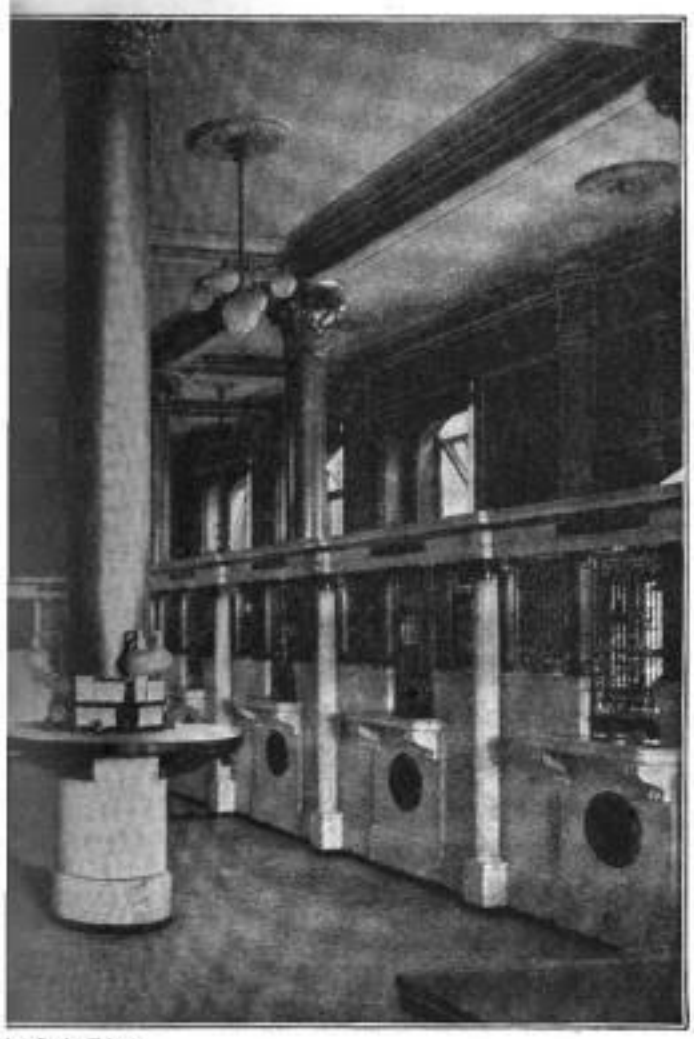
EVERYWHERE I encountered the principle that a right business system provides administrative men with time to perform "thinking parts," leaving details to be carried out by less expensive understudies. The General Sales Manager, for example, goes through the orders each morning, but simply for the purpose of getting a line on the business that is on passage through the house. Again, in the afternoon, he gets a detailed report on what has been done. In neither of these cases does he ordinarily record a word or a figure. So with the Order Censor. He is paid for knowing things and for thinking. To burden him with the details of prices would be absurd, as Baker-Vawter Company has a list of 30,000 price quotations. These are "remembered" in an index book which the pricer swiftly consults, and then carries out the figures. But this man who forms the executive link between the office and the factory must know completely the construction of every article manufactured. And he must see that the descriptive mistakes of his customers — and they are legion — are not allowed to go through. Then, too, it is a sound principle that the accounting of any manufacturing business should be done in the office and not at the factory. On the other hand, the only place for the making of cost records is at the factory.

Pausing beside one of the flat-bed typewriting machines, I glanced at the complement of sheets recorded at a single writing. These were headed:

1. "Acknowledgment of Order — This is not an Invoice;"
2. "Salesman's Order;"
3. "Office Order;"
4. "Office Register;"
5. "Factory Order;"
6. "Factory Register;"
7. "Cost Department."

Every possible item of description, of instruction, of check and cross-check essential to the manufacture and shipment of goods, and to the accounting and collecting records of the transaction, is provided for in these marvelously-devised blanks. But it is the use of these tools and not the tools themselves in which we are most interested. When this was suggested to my guide he stepped to the Order Censor's desk and took up a binder filled with "Office Register" sheets. These were arranged and indexed by numbers. Another binder contained the "Office Order" sheets, indexed under the names of the customers.

"The records contained in these sheets," continued my guide, "are identical and are uniform with the 'factory register' and 'factory order' sheets, which are also filed, respectively, by number and by names. This makes it possible for the office instantly to communicate with the factory concerning any order, and to absolutely identify it either by its number or by the name of the person placing the order. Under our system every department is automatically advised of the stage of progress made by every other department in the filling of each order, thus indicating at once where any delay is impeding the progress of executing the order. But the big problem in every manufacturing business is the question of cost."



Actual Factory Costs, Not Estimates

"SYSTEM — real system! — solves this problem and saves the manufacturer margins large enough to roll up good dividends. Many manufacturers — perhaps most of them — are running their factory costs on the basis of estimates. They figure that because their products cost them 'about so much last year they will cost about the same this year.' The old-fashioned 'cost books' are records of the most expensive guessing exercises that have ever been indulged in outside the operations of pure speculation and ames of chance. The manufacturing business that is run on this asis has no show in competition with those operated on a detailed ost system of thoroughly modern type,—one that takes minute ccount of every element that enters into the expense of a product. The man with a cost system of this kind is working in clear daylight, while the one without it is groping in the dark. The advantage of competition under the system that gives absolute cost instead of stimated cost is so great that it almost insures success from the utset, in a struggle otherwise fairly balanced between contestants.

"Many a manufacturer who nets $25,000 a year thinks himself aster of the situation because he has a practical knowledge of roduction processes and of selling his product. He leaves the natter of his cost system to the ingenuity of a cheap bookkeeper, with the result that his profits are lessened by a heavy percentage —in many cases by a third or a half—because he makes his selling rices on a false and deceptive estimate of cost.

"Under the cost systems devised by Baker-Vawter Company very cent that goes into a factory is charged to the account of something and every cent of departmental and administrative exense goes into the total of the cost figures—not on the basis of 'what it cost to run the house last year,' with certain variations igured from current probabilities, but on the actual expenditures of he current fortnight. Everything from typewriter ribbons to taxes nd from ink to interest is included in this computation of costs.

"And in this connection, it should be said that our system proides a perpetual inventory of assets and of obligations so that he administrative officers have the absolute, naked, net conditions f their business under their eye from week to week."

How Salesmen and Specialists are Trained

INQUIRY into the former connections of Baker-Vawter accountants and the men who devise business systems reveals the significant fact that these men have been taken from positions of igh responsibility and trust in large business organizations. Some f them have resigned from important places on the administrative staffs of great corporations; others have been induced to leave auditorships in prominent financial organizations, and still others ome from executive positions in large manufacturing establishments, merchandising houses, banks and trust companies. And hese men have been added to the systematizing staff of this rganization of Business Counselors at a material advance in salary ver that which their former occupations afforded them. "Sound timber, seasoned in the dry-kiln of practical business experience," is the standard by which all selections for this corps of pecialists in the science of business are judged. And then the rule s "each man to his special line."

To every employer of salesmen there is a valuable suggestion n the schooling which is given to all who are sent out into the field ommercially to represent Baker-Vawter Company. No man leaves his establishment as a salesman or solicitor until he has had nany weeks of daily drill and training in the school room of the louse. This department is in session every working hour of each business day, and no college or high school can boast a more faithful attendance upon class sessions or a more whole-souled attention on the part of its pupils than can this novel educational institution, whose students are paid good salaries from the moment of their enrollment. And it matters not how wide the general experience or how responsible the former connections of the men entering the service of this company; they must all pass through the school room and receive the diploma of the head salesman's approval before being permitted to represent the house in active negotiations with the business world.

Every Client Teaches the Expert

NATURALLY the man who has grown up in any line of commercial or industrial effort meets the suggestion that an "outsider" can successfully advise him on the methods of that enterprise with the question:

"What license have you to assume that you—a man from the outside—can tell me how to run my business, in which I have spent years of actual work?"

That the business man is fairly entitled to ask this question is readily granted by the officers of this organization of Business Counselors. Their answer is: "Because our specialists are constantly re-enforcing their own experience by a searching, analytical study of the conditions, methods and systems obtaining in scores and hundreds of business houses of every description; because they are perpetually in contact with the best administrative and accounting talent in the business world; because practically every one of our 50,000 customers is an active executive or a progressive accountant in a business house that is wide-awake and trying to keep pace with the march of modern progress in the science of doing things. With comparatively few exceptions, these men have contributed to the stock of information which is the working capital of our corps of specialists in Business System. We do not 'know it all.' We learn from all with whom we come in contact, either personally or by correspondence. Broadly speaking, we have 50,000 advisers, all of them in active business. These are our customers.

"To-day a member of our staff enters a large mercantile establishment and begins his examination. He commands the confidence of the officials and his investigation reveals a new condition or a new way of handling a certain feature of that business. Whether this new feature is in the nature of a remedy or of something to be remedied the result is the same—the investigator is so much the richer in his equipment for the next task of similar kind to which he is called. This applies not only to accounting methods but also to the more material matters. Because he finds that one house is suffering from a chronic blockade in its shipping department owing to inadequate elevator or truck service, he is put on guard for this sort of stoppage in every other house which he is called upon to serve.

"Some time ago one of our systematizers doubled the facility with which a certain house put out its shipments by devising a special elevator service. Instantly this subject was brought to the attention of every member of the corps and the problem of the internal transfer of goods, involving the use of elevators and moving platforms, was subjected to a searching study for the benefit of the entire staff. As a result we have saved our subsequent patrons, in the elimination of waste labor and waste time in getting out goods, a value aggregating thousands of dollars.

"Then, too, almost every case of peculation or defaulting which is uncovered by our accountants brings to light new methods in these irregularities and new methods of tracing and of preventing them. Each investigation is a fresh lesson in business system which is made to add to the efficiency of every man in the special service of this organization. Not long since one of our men encountered an organized conspiracy by which a group of employees who had contrived to make away with several thousand dollars' worth of goods. The situation was baffling, but at length the specialist suggested a novel plan by which a large portion of the lost goods was recovered and the identity of the criminals established. The lesson thus learned is capable of application in almost any business where a similar leakage is evident or suspected."

Bankers Not Exempt from Need of System

NO STUDENT of this new profession of giving counsel in business administration can fail to reach the conclusion that its application is less than universal. The practical experience of the specialists sent out by Baker-Vawter Company conclusively demonstrates this point. Every line of manufacturing, jobbing, wholesale and retail merchandising, banking, and other forms of commercial and industrial enterprise has been subjected to investigation and report, with results that have constantly widened the scope of the service and have uniformly effected the elimination of waste, the increase of facility and accuracy, and the conserving of energy and expense, as well as the consistent expansion of production and revenues. Banks are commonly presumed to be the most highly organized of all business bodies, but these institutions are no exception to the rule that the specialist in business system is able to devise means by which any and all commercial and accounting operations may be brought to a still higher degree of efficiency. Hundreds of banks, including many in metropolitan cities, are still following the old practice of recopying each record and multiplying the labor of accounting in a business in which time is peculiarly the essence of all transactions. By the modern method, the same writing which makes a journal record furnishes the remittance sheet. In every transaction the latest system effects a similar saving of labor, time and opportunity for error. In a word, the explanation of the system specialists carries the conviction that the bank which is now operated on the accounting methods of ten years ago is clinging to its traditions at fifty per cent. additional payroll expense.

The experience of a prominent bank official who organized a new financial institution and placed the devising of its working system in the hands of the Baker-Vawter staff is given in a letter to that company in which occurs this significant paragraph:

Order Clerk and Assistant

> "As the demands of our business have grown the work is done with the same ease that it was in the beginning. When I think of the amount of labor and trouble usually consumed in experiments when organizing and maintaining the office of a large corporation, I feel a sense of satisfaction that we were relieved from so much unnecessary work through your intelligent effort."

Retail Business Especially Demands System

OFTEN the retailer is also inclined to feel that his business is an exception to the rule and does not lend itself to the good results obtained by the service of the business systematizer in other lines. Statistics of the appalling percentage of failures in the retail trade, together with the fact that this branch of merchandising is the least progressive in seeking the counsel of the expert in business system, are significant, and point with emphasis the need of more modern and analytical methods. In fact his need of departmental analysis, to the end of curtailing unprofitable stocks and weeding out those which score positive losses, is paramount. This can only be accomplished by an accounting system which provides for a division of departments and stocks in such a manner that, at regular periods, they may be subjected to a positive loss and gain showing. Again, the retailer must depend upon a quick and frequent "turning over" of his investment. Here a thorough knowledge of all stock-on-hand and available stock is an absolute essential. Much of his success rests upon keeping his supply to a minimum, and consequently it follows that a system which does not help him to hold his buying down to a strict "short supply" basis is an expensive luxury.

The retailer who does not have as exact and analytical a knowledge of every condition and feature of his business as has the metropolitan wholesaler is working at a fatal disadvantage. And the wholesaler does not fail to avail himself of the services of the expert in business system.

One ineffaceable impression gained from a conversation with the various members of the Baker-Vawter staff—now at home in their model offices in the Tribune Building, Chicago—is best expressed in the question: What may not be the possibilities for usefulness, in serving any business organization, of the superbly qualified men who have spent years in going from one establishment to another, analyzing diversified conditions and devising progressive methods—men who practically command the counsel of 50,000 workers in the world of business? Fortified and broadened by the expert assistance of these Business Scientists the modern executive of affairs may reasonably aspire to achievements otherwise hopelessly beyond attainment!

"LA LEY DE FUGA"

The Law of Flight in the Southwest

BY N. A. JENNINGS

WHEN Texas was the Botany Bay of the United States, the refuge for outlaws who sought her broad plains and thinly-settled border, and who banded together there and lived by organized cattle thefts and horse stealing, the law officers of the State, the sheriffs and Texas Rangers, led a ceaselessly active and exciting life. To hunt down the desperadoes and arrest them was but a part of the work; to convey the prisoners to jail was another thing. Frequently it became necessary to ride with a prisoner over a sparsely-settled country for many miles before a place of safe-keeping could be reached. This afforded the prisoner's friends a fine opportunity to effect a rescue, and such rescues were of frequent occurence until what was known as "la ley de fuga" became the universal plan pursued by the officers. The "ley de fuga"—the law of flight—was the practice of killing prisoners whenever an attempt to rescue them was made by their friends. Harsh and cruel as the rule undoubtedly was, there was nothing else to be done. As soon as it became generally known among the desperadoes that an attempt to rescue a friend from the officers meant the sure death of that friend such attempts ceased.

This rule was in force during those years—from 1875 to 1878—that I served as a Texas Ranger. There were many outlaws and but few Rangers, and we had, for the most part, to hunt our quarry in small squads. Often only two or three Rangers went together to arrest the desperadoes, and it was only because of the knowledge that we had strict orders to kill any prisoners and then fight those who attempted their rescue, that we were enabled to get those we arrested to jail. Twice was the rule put into practice, and both times not only were the prisoners—murderers, as it happened—killed, but their would-be rescuers were severely punished.

In December, 1876, I was one of eighteen Rangers who were detailed to go with Lieutenant Lee Hall to DeWitt County in the southwestern part of the State and execute warrants for men indicted by the grand jury there. The county had been for years the scene of a bloody feud between the Taylor and the Sutton factions, and the Sheriff was powerless to preserve order. Scores of men on both sides had been killed, and every man and boy in the county went armed and ready at a second's notice to defend his life, or, perhaps, to commit a murder. The braver men on both sides met and fought openly, but the cowards resorted to other tactics. They lay in wait in the brush by the side of a road and shot their enemies in the back as they rode by. A little before our advent a number of the Sutton party had gone at midnight to the home of Doctor Brazell, an old gentleman, dragged him from a bed where he lay ill, and deliberately murdered him before the eyes of his helpless wife and daughters. Doctor Brazell's son made an attempt to protect his father and he, too, was murdered.

Seven men were indicted for this brutal murder, but so wide was the reign of terror in DeWitt County that they did not fear arrest and trial. They knew that the Sheriff would not dare attempt their capture, for such action on his part would have meant death to him within twenty-four hours. Even had he had the temerity to undertake their arrest he had no deputies upon whom he could depend for assistance, for he could not trust the men in his own office.

This was the state of affairs when the Circuit Judge, the late Henry Clay Pleasants—a fearless and upright man—sent for the Rangers. We arrived in Clinton, the county seat, one night in the middle of December and went into camp. Of course, the news of our arrival spread rapidly throughout the county and every one knew we were there to enforce the laws, though the adherents of the Sutton and Taylor factions laughed at the idea of nineteen young men coming against them.

The murderers of old Doctor Brazell had no fear that we could take them, for they gathered about them seventy or eighty of the Sutton party, all armed, and spent their time riding over the county from one farmhouse to another and having "frolics" in the evenings.

But we arrested them. One night we surrounded a house where they had gathered to have a dance at the wedding of one of the accused murderers. We took them completely by surprise, and although they numbered nearly a hundred we captured them without a shot being fired. At dawn we rode into Clinton, about five miles away, and lodged the seven indicted men in the county jail, a miserably insecure, wooden structure. It was not at all the sort of place in which to confine such dangerous men as the accused murderers. The cells were not much stronger than so many dry-goods boxes would have been, and so it was decided to put the men in a room in the second story and guard them there for the time being.

This room was about twenty feet square and had two barred and grated windows looking out on the one straggling street of the town. A door opened into a narrow entry which separated the room from that part of the jail containing the cells. As the place was bare of any furniture, the prisoners slept on blankets on the floor along the wall. The eighteen Rangers were divided by Hall into three detachments of six each, so that six men would be on guard at a time. We each stood guard four hours every day and four hours every night. Of the six on guard at a time two were assigned to remain in the room with the prisoners; the remaining four were on duty outside the jail.

Just before we started with the prisoners from the house where we arrested them, Hall gave orders to the Rangers in a loud voice to kill all seven men if any attempt were made to rescue them. He purposely gave those orders within hearing of the prisoners and their friends. He said:

"If any of these prisoners attempt to escape, kill them. If any attempt is made at any time, either to-day or later, to rescue them, kill them first and then fight the rescuers. Your first duty will be to kill the prisoners without hesitation; those are my specific orders."

No comment was made by the prisoners or their friends upon these orders, for they were all familiar with "la ley de fuga."

Despite the orders, however, we had not been guarding our seven murderers more than three days before word reached us from a number of sources that an attempt would surely be made to rescue them. We heard on good authority that fully two hundred of the Sutton party were banded together under the leadership of a notorious outlaw, and that they were going to ride into Clinton, kill every Ranger there and murder Judge Pleasants. A number of the Taylor faction came to us and offered their assistance, but Hall curtly declined it and told them we were not taking sides in their feud. He laughed at the threats, but he gave us all strict orders not to let our carbines out of our hands for a moment during the daytime and to sleep with our arms under our blankets within easy reach of our hands. Thereafter, even when we took our meals, we had our carbines resting across our knees, or within the hollow of our arms. All friends of the prisoners were kept from holding any communication with them, and at night any citizen coming within two hundred feet of the jail was halted and turned back. We had orders to shoot any man crossing the "dead line" after we had halted him.

Such was the state of things when one day, about a week after we had made the capture, it came my turn to go into the room with the seven prisoners and assist another Ranger in guarding them. We had become well acquainted with them by that time and our intercourse was as friendly as possible under such conditions. They were a reckless, light-hearted set of men and passed the time in telling stories and singing. They seemed careless of the terrible charge hanging over their heads, and regarded their detention in jail as a temporary embarrassment.

On this particular morning I remembered that one of their number was lying flat on his back on his blankets singing a song, four were playing poker, and the other two were looking on. I happened to glance out of one of the windows, and what I saw in the street compelled my instant attention. My comrades, the Rangers, were running here and there, hastily examining their carbines to see

LIKE A GOOD EYE

A good system is like a good eye. With it a man can watch every detail of his business, every hour of the day, and every day of the year.

And the man who reads

SYSTEM

a 96-page monthly magazine, knows as much about system and business methods as anyone can possibly tell him. It is brimful of bright ideas and clever systems.

The president of a large lumber company says:

"It is absolutely necessary to us in the conduct of our business to have before us such information as SYSTEM gives. Our entire office system has been made up from suggestions contained in your publication."

The McCormick Harvesting Machine Co., The National Cash Register Co., Montgomery Ward & Co., American Cereal Co., Brown Hoisting Machine Co., Sherwin-Williams Co., Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co., Deere & Co., The Parry Mfg. Co., and like concerns subscribe for SYSTEM and endorse it. Some of them take as many as seven copies monthly. SYSTEM will surely help you.

The man of experience gets in SYSTEM the experience of other men. To the young man beginning business, to the clerk, bookkeeper or student, SYSTEM is more than a business college.

The general articles will help any man—business or professional. The special articles for one's own work no man can afford to miss.

Systems actually used in large successful factories, offices, stores, banks, publications, professions, are described in detail. And experts show how these same systems can be adapted to your business or profession—no matter what it is—how large or how small.

that they were in good working order, posting themselves behind dry-goods boxes in front of a store on the opposite side of the street—all evidently preparing for action. Hall was standing in the middle of the street, shading his eyes with his hand from the sun and peering intently at something seemingly at a distance. I followed the direction of his glance and saw what made my heart suddenly seem to stand still—a long double line of horsemen approaching. Their horses' feet made a great cloud of dust, and it was impossible even at the elevation of the window to say how many they were.

Instantly it came to me that the threatened rescue of the prisoners and massacre of the Rangers was about to be attempted, and I could see that my comrades below were preparing to give the Suttonites a hot reception. I managed to attract the attention of the other Ranger, and he, too, looked out of the window and in a second realized the situation. The prisoners were still intent with their game and knew nothing of what was passing outside.

Not a word passed between my comrade and me, but we looked into each other's eyes and both knew what was before us. With one accord we took our places in the two corners of the room opposite the wall where the windows were. Suddenly there was a shout from the street—a cowboy yell—and at its sound the seven prisoners scrambled to their feet and went to the windows to see what was the matter. At that instant I noiselessly withdrew the cartridge from my carbine and set the gun in the corner behind me. Then I drew my revolver, with its six .45 calibre bullets in the chamber, cocked it and—waited.

In spite of all my efforts to be calm I could not keep my hand from trembling violently. A sudden horrible empty feeling in the pit of my stomach and a sensation of nausea came to me. My teeth chattered so that it seemed to me the sound must be heard by the prisoners who were still intently gazing out of the windows. There was no personal fear to cause my agitation; it came of the knowledge that at any minute I should be compelled to kill a number of unarmed, defenseless men in cold blood. I should have to stand there with my back to the wall and shoot them down. I should have to look into their frightened eyes and slay without ceasing. I should have to listen to their agonizing cries for mercy and close my heart to them. I saw the unequal struggle as though it were already taking place. I verily believe that if at that moment the prisoners had suddenly turned on us with pistols in their hands I could have shouted with joy at the chance to fight them all single-handed in that room. Anything would have been better than the thought of shooting them down deliberately while I stood in safety in that corner.

And still they stood there by the windows, looking out. The seconds dragged themselves into minutes, the minutes crept on slowly, and with straining senses I waited.

I looked at my comrade in the opposite corner. His face was like chalk in its deadly pallor, but his jaw was set with determination. He was ready to do his share of the butchery! And I must help him!

At last there was a sound of footsteps on the stairs; some one was coming up. The door opened and Lieutenant Hall came into the room. The seven men turned from the windows and one of them said to Hall in a tone of ordinary curiosity:

"Who's them men rode into town jest now, Lieutenant?"

"Horse thieves, captured by the vigilantes," said Hall. Then he looked at me, noted the six-shooter still in my hand and saw my drawn and haggard face. With quick comprehension he realized what had been happening in that room. He stepped to the door and called to two of the Rangers to come upstairs and relieve me and my comrade.

As I put my six-shooter back in its holster at my belt and picked up my carbine, one of the prisoners suddenly paled and staggered. Then, in a trembling voice, he said:

"And ye were ready to kill us, were ye? I can see it in your eyes, man; th'ain't no use to deny it. I reckon we had a mighty close call and I ain't hankerin' for no more like it. Lieutenant, I've heered rumors as how some o' the boys was thinkin' o' tryin' a rescue. If you'll gimme a bit o' paper and a pencil I'll jest write a line to a friend o' mine and there won't be no rescuin' tried on this trip."

He wrote the note, and no more talk of an attempt at rescue came to us. His friends were made to realize the full significance of "la ley de fuga."

LITERARY FOLK

Their Ways and Their Work

LITERARY DISLIKES — All words do not pass current in the exchange of Literature. Beware the counterfeits!

¶ Every man who reads, writes or talks has some pet antipathy of speech — a word that has an ugly sound to the ear, a word that strikes the eye disagreeably in type, or a phrase become an affectation and grown nauseous, like "make for," or rendered distasteful by association — associations of childhood, perhaps. Within the intimate acquaintance of the editor of this column curious significations are given to such innocent words as "palm" and "grease." Grease — in its sense of wheel grease — has for one man an invincible compulsion of disgust, so much so that his friends in private conversation are always at pains to employ some polite circumlocution. To another "hug" is most offensive, and he will go to almost any circuitous length to avoid it; while to still another "fondle" as a term of endearment is little short of nauseous; and "horrid" — which certainly should bring up anything but mirth-compelling suggestions — is somehow irresistibly comic.

Acting on this personal acquaintance with some knowledge of how curious and intimate a process is the elaboration of style, it was thought that interesting hints and suggestions of personal antipathies might be drawn from the miners and coiners of words themselves. Accordingly a letter was sent out to several of our better known writers, and some of the responses are here printed.

Mr. George Ade cannot abide the word genius.

"A genius," he writes, "as commonly misapplied, serves to red-rag me about as much as any other item in our vocabulary. So far as I can discover, a genius may be any one of the following:

"One: The author or authoress of unpublished verses.

"Two: The sixteen-year-old Raphael who has succeeded in making a pen copy of something by Gibson or Christy.

"Three: The bald-headed gentleman who permits any one to select a card from the deck, and then picks the card on the third shuffle.

"Four: The young miss who moves up to the baby grand and does things to Paderewski's Minuet.

"Five: The firstborn who at the age of six can name all the Presidents.

"Six: The amateur who has played Claude Melnotte for one night for an assemblage of relatives and friends, and is waiting for the Frohmans to come along and discover him.

"Seven: The lawyer who knows Shakespeare by heart and owes office rent and would be all right if he didn't drink.

"Eight: Cousin Henry, whose stuff is too good for the publishers.

"There are other glittering examples, but possibly these will suffice."

Mr. Charles G. D. Roberts objects to being called a literary man. "I think my special aversion," he writes, "is the phrase 'literary man,' but why I bear a personal grievance against it instead of merely reprobating it as bad usage it would puzzle me to say. Probably if I could dig far enough back into my memory I should find that some one whom I disliked had applied the harmless phrase to myself.

"Another word that I now dislike is the beautiful word confer — probably because I have loved it in the past not wisely but too well, and am now ashamed to look it in the face.

Mr. Owen Wister thinks that two words "well nigh in universal use" are not only "disagreeable, but also not even English," to wit:

"One: The use of like for as; 'We do like you do.' This always seems like language going down the street without any collar or necktie on.

"Two: The signing a letter with a lone adverb: 'Sincerely, John Jones.' Of course, he is sincerely John Jones, unless he is an alias. The phrase without 'yours' makes nonsense."

Mr. Winston Churchill has no friendship for the split infinitive, and condemns "the words of Gallic extraction which are creeping into the language, such as automobile. Better by far is motor car."

Mr. Bliss Carman, besides being good enough to furnish his "pet antipathy" gave a very suggestive little essay on the use of slang. "Yes, of course," he says, "I have preferences in speech. They are always for what seem to me the best words. I dislike pedantry and vulgarity, the one as much as the other. We must have a living language. The ultra purist does not care about that; a dead language is his standard. The ultra radical, on the other hand, does not care a cent for beauty or fitness or art. And yet we must have a language that has all these qualities.

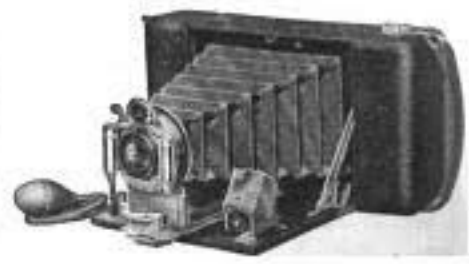
"I abominate snuffy old academical drones; but I also shudder at the smart sensationalists. They are both equally bad.

"Moreover, slang is the new growth of language — some of it good and some of it worthless, like the new growth of the forest. A wise forester knows what to prune away. Notice how new and modern and strictly contemporary Mr. Howells is in his diction; how he is never above using a current phrase, and yet how pure and graceful and delicate his style is.

"Only one word is my pet aversion, and dear Lord, how I hate that word! — 'hustle.' Why, I do not know, unless it is because I loath all it stands for in America — all the worse elements in human nature: selfishness, greed, superficiality, display. It is another name of the false god whom we worship — Mammon. All other English words, however blasphemous, pedantic or obscene, are to me quite innocent. Only this detestable one can I not abide."

Miss Josephine Dodge Daskam avers that in the matter of words or phrases candor compels her to state that the word "cosy" irritates her beyond belief. There is, she says, absolutely no reason for it, "except my firm conviction that it is the most utterly bourgeois collection of letters on the face of the earth."

Mr. Charles Battell Loomis will have nothing to do with "comical." He says: "There is more than one word in the English language that excites bullish tendencies in me; 'galore' likes me not, and 'rotten' in its modern British application is a word I avoid, but my pet detestation is a harmless little fellow that goes by the name of 'comical.'



"That I cannot stand. The use of it by a writer makes me doubt his possession of a keenly analytical humorous sense. I know that the dislike is not a reasonable one; that if one who is a fanatic is fanatical, then one who produces comic effects is comical, but its use (to me) argues a looseness of thought, and I think of the man who says a thing is 'comical' as roaring immoderately over a verbal joke in Punch. A peculiarly primitive order of clown will give voice to a most obvious, puerile witticism, and the dull, porcine looking auditor at your right slaps his knees and says, 'He's a comical genius and no mistake.' He typifies the word 'comical.'

"It makes no difference that men whose humor and whose sense of humor equally delight me have used the word (I remember what a blow it was to me when I first came across it in Stevenson); as long as I live I shall instinctively shudder when my eye alights on it in the context of a prose-master, and I will go to work to prove to myself that there were mitigating circumstances — that his use of it was justifiable in that particular case; that he meant to indicate cheap, yokel humor.

"I do not wish to be misunderstood as laying down the law in the matter; for those on whose ears the sound of the word does not jar, 'comical' is perfectly defensible, having the sanction of usage by the masters, but it needn't seek employment of me."

Mr. George Horton has a deep, abiding hatred of hackneyed transitions — those well-worn stepping-stones of rhetoric. "It seems to me," he writes, "that my pet aversion, among phrases, is our old friend, 'Suiting the action to the word.' If one becomes a slave to it in his own work it will haunt him persistently and follow him for years. The story-writer naturally has the feeling that his pages must be part dialogue and part action.

Great gain in utility; no loss in convenience.

"'I will kill you!' hissed the Count Montmorrency, through his teeth. Suiting the action to the word, he stabbed Walter Fotheringay to the heart.

"How much more thrilling this is than merely to state that the Count Montmorrency said he would stab Walter Fotheringay—and he did!

"Doesn't that expression, 'Suiting the action to the word,' have a familiar sound? It has, indeed, and it has been used by the story-writers till it can fairly be said to be worn out. I hate it because I am sick of it, and because it is one of those formulas which are destructive of all originality.

"A word which is used all too much, it seems to me, is 'tone,' attached to various adjectives. This, too, is likely to become an obsession, if one is not on guard. 'In a tender tone,' 'in a serious tone,' 'in a melancholy tone,' 'in an exasperated tone,' etc., ad infinitum. I read a novel not long ago in which no character was allowed to say anything unless he said it in some kind of a 'tone.' When Mr. Smith said 'Good morning,' or 'It's a pleasant day,' he spoke in a 'natural tone!'"

THE DEPOPULATION OF THE PEERAGE
—If the paper mills keep grinding them up we shall have to restock the forests.

¶ The cry for the preservation of our forests is likely to find an echo in England in a plea for a less prodigal use of aristocratic titles in the pages of fiction. Time was when English novelists were content to indicate the highest forms of breeding without having recourse to titles at all, as in the case of the "Lady of the Manor," whose instructive talks to the young women of the parish are still treasured in British households as models of wholesome gentility; while "Lady Audley," whose fearsome "Secret" once thrilled the entire middle zone of the three kingdoms, was, after all, nothing but a baronet's lady and therefore not, strictly speaking, a member of the nobility. Miss Austen and Miss Edgeworth were both chary in their use of titles, and so are Lucas Malet and Miss Rhoda Broughton of our own generation, although both of these last named ladies are famous for their portrayals of life among the upper classes.

Disraeli, however, made terrible inroads into the aristocracy's finest timber during his golden literary youth, while Ouida and "The Duchess" have appropriated to their use princes, dukes, duchesses, earls and viscounts in a manner that suggests the ever-hungry maw of a wood-pulp mill.

In Lady Rose's Daughter Mrs. Humphry Ward reveals herself as a disciple of this school by not only introducing us on almost her first page to a handsome young duchess, but in actually teaching us to call her "Evelyn" before we have reached the end of the second chapter. It is likely to prove a good move on her part, so far as the selling qualities of the book are concerned, but, after all, the use of a title for the purpose of conferring distinction on a person honored by the friendship of its wearer, as in the case of Julie Le Breton, is not likely to add to the fame of the woman who created in Helbeck of Bannisdale as true a gentleman as is to be found in the whole range of modern English fiction.

That Mrs. Ward should have drawn upon the very highest rank of the peerage in this reckless fashion when a mere countess would have served her purpose perfectly well is a matter for serious regret, like the ruthless devastation of our forests. We are already taking means to replenish our wasted timber lands despite the fact that it will be many years before they are completely exhausted, and certainly the time has come to take steps for the preservation of the British aristocracy from the hordes of fiction-writers who are dragging it down to the level of the commonplace. There are only twenty-two dukes in all England, but ten times that number are created each year by industrious English novelists, and the growing popularity of the novel of "smart" society seems likely to increase that number tenfold more.

As yet, the potentates of Europe and the members of the English royal family have been spared, but their ranks must soon be drawn upon, for now even the name of a duke is a weak one to conjure with, and we shall soon read of a society that is peopled by kings, princes and one or two popes.

Profits of Ad. Writing.

From Clerkships and Mechanics to Advertising Managers—From Small Salaries to $1200—$6000 a Year

By GEORGE H. POWELL

THE marvelous possibilities of the advertising writing business—the vocation that is calling for more and more young men and women, who have been properly trained—are multiplying daily. The stupendous commercial growth of America is partly responsible, but the most vital reason is the comparatively recent discovery that good, attractive advertisements are the generative motors that supply power to the world's business machinery.

In the words of a shrewd observer, "a wheel can get along without oil—so can the modern business without advertising—but it goes hard."

There is no story so profoundly absorbing, no recital so inspiring as the one which takes the ambitious Young American by the hand, points out the victories of others, and shows how even greater achievements await those who are determined to win life's battle.

Once the profession of law was the magnet of attraction, but to-day King Commerce has strewn his thousands of paths with gold, which may be gathered by work and perseverance. The greatest intellects of the world are directing this modern business expansion, and while great consolidations of vested interests may continue, yet the demand for high salaried lieutenants will ever increase.

And even the small dealer, who labored and struggled, and grew gray—who eked out a fair yearly income because of his limited resources—is to-day, if endowed with brains and industry, in a position to earn as a department head for others double what he could under old conditions.

It is this new order of things—this gigantic multiplication of manufacturing and merchandising—that has created such a demand for modern advertising, and which in turn calls for trained men and women in the departments of advertising writing.

And when we stop to think and realize that the best ad. writers receive their trainings through mail instruction, then the marvelous good that can be accomplished by the correspondence educational plan is appreciated at its best.

When young men and women, blessed with only common school educations and without "born talent," can be taught to write original, catchy advertising, so that they are capable of earning large incomes in a comparatively short time, it must be conceded that correspondence instruction is a permanent, lasting factor in the solution of life's work.

It will be interesting to note how advertising writers are being developed and placed in fine positions through my system of instruction, and the two portraits used herewith are only representative of Powell students generally.

Mr. Wm. Waring, Cohoes, N. Y., was formerly a machinist, and after taking another course in advertising without results, he enrolled in the Powell System, and now spends much of his spare time in telling others why it is the only practical course known. Today an advertising manager of skill, he is booked for greater things, and it is but a question of time when he will again double his income.

Mr. Norton Mattocks, of Duluth, Minn., has won high honors in grocery advertising, and is to-day capable of filling a much better position. Indeed, as his father writes me, "you don't know what a new man you have made of him." Mr. Mattocks, Sr., also adds: "When Norton told me he was taking lessons from you by correspondence I rather scorned it, as I supposed he would be taught only by printed forms—until he showed me the correspondence—then I was astonished to see how so much time and labor could be given for so small a fee. Are you working for love?—it cannot be for what there is in it for you! Yet behind all I see the true essence and spirit of advertising."

I quote only a small portion of this letter from a grateful father who has had wide opportunity for seeing how splendidly I am able by my superior system of correspondence instruction to develop the ambitious worker. Only space forbids a score of similar expressions.

An employee of the Post-Intelligencer, the great Pacific Coast daily paper of Seattle, received a promotion before he had completed half my course. Another student with the National Cash Register Co. has won recognition in a very short time, and has been responsible for other Dayton enrollments in my school. A young man whose health compelled him to leave Dartmouth College before graduation, was only last week made advertising manager of one of New York's largest clothing and furnishing stores, after barely completing the Powell System. These few examples will serve to show the openings now existing, and they increase constantly. More great national advertisers than ever come to me for trained ad. writers, and this condition must obtain for many years to come.

The Powell System differs from book instruction in that I personally supervise and direct each student's advertising education as he or she requires, and no form letters for criticisms are ever used. What books I do furnish are for a supplementary purpose.

The chief fault of the early ad.-schools lies in lack of understanding as to limitations, and instead of loading up students with superfluous news and detail about matters really foreign to the duties of the ad.-writer, the concentrated efforts ought to be along the line of the actual writing of ads. In this way, largely, is the Powell System superior to all others.

I shall be happy to mail my elegant new Prospectus, the most interesting of its kind ever published, telling how I educate and qualify young men and women for advertising positions, and how I help business men to double their incomes. Simply address me George H. Powell, 197 Temple Court, New York City, N. Y.

The Birds' Friends and Enemies

By Harold Bolce

IN THE complicated and diversified game laws of the fifty States and Territories there is much confusion as to the difference between game birds and insectivorous, song and plume birds. One State settles the question of game birds broadly by including in the term "all birds found in the state of nature." Ornithologists contend that such birds as flickers, robins and meadowlarks are too valuable as insect destroyers to be killed for the table, yet in many sections the open seasons expose these species to sportsmen. The meadowlark in particular is declared by Professor Beal to be without a peer as a destroyer of insect pests, but in spite of this service its occasional appetite for cereal food denies it clemency on the part of many farmers, and in some States it is classified with injurious birds and slaughtered. Bouvier's Law Dictionary defines game birds to be those of "a wild nature obtained by fowling and hunting," which is sufficiently Delphic in its uncertainty to fill the courts with contests.

Attempts to make the laws more definite by enumerating species to be protected result in equal ambiguity, for there are 1152 kinds of birds north of Mexico, and their diversity of popular names and untechnical classification make legal reference to them a source of perplexity both to hunters and game wardens. The American Ornithologists' Union has sought to overcome the difficulty by suggesting that statutes specify only the orders and families into which science divides birds. In that way they can be definitely and uniformly classified throughout the country. For example, if the law should state that the anatidæ, rallidæ, limicolæ and gallinæ be considered game birds, there could be no dispute in final tests as to the species included, although it might take some time to accustom hunters and game officials to the technical nomenclature employed. As it is now, birds of widely differing habits and species are confused under common names. The "coot," for example, of New England, is a scoter duck, while the coot proper is not a duck at all, but a member of the rail family.

Only 200 species (about eighteen per cent.) of the birds of the country are strictly game birds. The protection afforded the remaining 952 varieties is far from adequate. Birds treasured for their song or plumage in one State are unemotionally consigned to the pot in another.

One of the scientists of the Biological Survey while stopping at a hotel in New Orleans learned that birds were to be served for dinner. Wandering around to the kitchen he found to his amazement an assortment of olive-backed thrush, hermit thrush, cardinals, vireos and thrashers. These little birds came duly to the table in tempting array under the disguise of grassé, but the naturalist had no appetite for them.

"You do not like birds?" asked his host.

"I love them," replied the scientist sadly, "but I cannot eat these."

"They are the best birds in the market."

"The very best, the most priceless," asserted the ornithologist, "but you might as well invite a lover of the opera to dine on his favorite prima donna as to expect a naturalist to sit down to a meal of warbling vireos."

The Temperance Principle

Not long ago it was learned that an Eastern firm was receiving large consignments of gulls, terns and grebes from a Southern State which did not afford them protection. As these birds were having an extensive sale, Doctor Palmer and the State authorities joined forces to break up the traffic. The dealer held that though his State forbade the killing of the plume birds, he had the right to sell those imported from a State where their slaughter was not unlawful. As this was an important case, which would serve as a precedent in a trade in which millions of dollars are invested, it was given a most thorough test.

After a long and hotly-contested trial the courts decided against the dealer. The result has been far-reaching. Most of the wholesale milliners now, before buying or selling any kind of feathers, forward samples to the Biological Survey to learn whether

FOOD IN NEED

Is a Friend Indeed.

Many times a school teacher in the middle of a heavy session requires exactly the right kind of food to rebuild the wasted nerve and brain tissues as well as to keep up the muscular energy. This is the business of Grape-Nuts, in which the starchy part of the pure cereals is turned to grape sugar and where the phosphates predominate, making it rich in food value and ready for the weakest stomach to assimilate immediately. A lady teacher of Minneapolis says:

"About four years ago I realized that I was breaking down nervously in the middle of a school year. To a school teacher this means not only loss of health but inability to go on with her work. Nothing appeared to help me and I was just about discouraged when a friend recommended that I look into Grape-Nuts. On reading what this food does toward rebuilding brain and nerve centers I made up my mind to give it a fair trial.

"I ate Grape-Nuts food dry with cream for breakfast and enjoyed it greatly; my improvement began immediately and was so steady that I did not realize how fully I had been benefited until an extra strain came on me in my school work through which I was able to go, continuing to improve all the time. Looking back on the trial now, I realize how this wonderful food saved me from a certain break-down.

"I have kept up the daily use of Grape-Nuts ever since and have never had a return of the trouble. I always take a package with me when traveling and I look upon the food as essential to my health as fresh air or exercise." Name furnished by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Protection for Song Birds

Nebraska affords protection to birds that are "attractive in appearance or cheerful in song," and many other States declare it unlawful to shoot song birds. Even this is not a clear classification. Many migrants sing in one State and are silent in another.

The winter wren goes South in cold weather and its voice is virtually hushed, but when the warm days return it starts North to enjoy the cooler forests. In the Adirondacks it is encountered, singing a song full of wonderful melody. No one but a Nature student would recognize in the musician of the New York forests the reticent little bird whose occasional peep fails to secure it membership in the southern chorus.

"I was in the Adirondacks one summer," said Doctor Fisher, "when, as I came around a huge boulder, I heard a burst of song that filled the air. I stopped in admiration, expecting to behold a fine big bird. But all I saw was the little winter wren so common and so quiet in the District of Columbia. I waited, and in a moment that tiny creature had opened its throat and repeated the amazing song, full and clear, and vibrant with indescribable melody."

It is plain, therefore, that the term "song birds" might readily be construed in southern localities to exclude varieties that reserve their minstrelsy for more northern climes.

Alabama, seeking to extend wide protection to song, plume and insectivorous birds enumerates fifty species, but as it has not seemed to be practicable in legislation to name all the species, there is much yet to be done to safeguard bird life in America. Every State has a different law. Sometimes certain species are protected in one county and freely slaughtered in an adjoining one.

Some birds secure protection only for a limited term of years. It becomes necessary for game wardens and Federal authorities watching interstate shipments to keep posted on all these diversified and constantly changing regulations. Texas exempts fifty-six out of two hundred and forty-four counties from compliance with its bird law. In Alabama the law applies only to seven counties out of sixty-six. Neighboring counties in Virginia, North Carolina and Tennessee have contradictory regulations. Some States afford no safeguard to the eggs of protected species. In New York State nearly three hundred amendments to the game laws have been passed within a decade. In some States where the killing of certain birds is unlawful, the fact of having these slain birds in one's possession or to sell them is not a interstate trade in that particular species is prohibited. As the answers from the official ornithologists are usually discouraging, the entire business is being rapidly readjusted to new conditions.

Recently it was learned that an influential wholesale dealer in bird plumage was working to secure special legislation to permit the sale of feathers brought from States or foreign countries where plume birds are unprotected. It was ascertained that the merchant, whose influence gave some promise of securing a retrograde enactment, was an ardent prohibitionist on the liquor question. As the Biological Survey aims to secure favorable laws through persuasion and education, rather than by dragooning opponents into cooperation, Doctor Palmer sought the wholesaler in his office.

"I understand," said the visitor, "that you are interested in prohibition."

"Yes," replied the merchant, putting aside correspondence to discuss his favorite topic. "I trust that our State law which forbids the sale of liquor will stand forever as a monument to the integrity of our commonwealth."

"But have you any objection to the sale of intoxicants distilled in other States or foreign countries and shipped in here?"

"Assuredly," was the reply. "The principle is the same."

"Well," said the visitor, "I have charge of the Government's efforts to protect American birds. If you are permitted to sell birds imported from other States, will it not open the way to fraudulent traffic in similar species now enjoying protection in your commonwealth?"

The dealer reflected a few minutes. "I had never looked at it in that light before," said he, "but I can see now that I have been in the wrong. Hereafter I shall apply the principle as you have presented it. You have appealed to my conscience in the matter, and here's my hand in pledge of my determination henceforth to cooperate with the Government in its efforts to make the bird laws uniform."

Learn Advertising

There is no other thing so needful to the young man in business as a knowledge of advertising. It is the great force of modern business and no merchant or manufacturer succeeds without it. The advertisement writer and manager is one of the highest-priced employees in any business, and his opportunities for advancement are the best.

Any man with a good common school education, energy and common sense can win a place for himself in the advertising world. Many of those who have followed my instructions now hold positions with leading concerns, and are receiving from $30 to $125 a week. Good ad-writers usually earn from $20 to $100. The accompanying picture will give you an idea of what one man has done in less than ten years, beginning with a desk and a fountain pen. My course of instruction costs $40 cash, or $50 in installments. It is the best investment any father can make for his son or that any young man can make for himself. A remittance at once will secure the full course and a $25 set of "The Art and Literature of Business" free.

A handsome prospectus of the course, giving full particulars and evidence from students as to its benefits, will be sent on receipt of three two-cent stamps, to pay cost of mailing, and there will be included my booklets, "How Shall a Young Man Succeed," "Other People's Brains," and "The Ill-Fortune of Brother Bill."

How to Secure this $25 Set of Books—Free

To just one hundred young men I am going to present "The Art and Literature of Business," which comprises six well-bound octavo volumes of approximately 400 pages each. It deals with the history, science and art of advertising, and tells exhaustively of every branch of the business.

The mechanical details, such as printing, engraving, etc., are taken up in their regular order, and the books are thus admirably adapted to the needs of the student of advertising and the business man who appreciates the necessity for a deeper insight into recognized methods of publicity, but who has heretofore been unable to secure a suitable reference work.

In a recent review Public Improvements, New York City, says:

"Each page contains some well-turned phrase that gives the whole a distinct literary flavor not generally met with in books of the kind. It is crowded with aphoristic philosophy that arouses and carries an interest from page to page. To all busy men this book will give great pleasure, for it treats of advertising in such a way as to make it as good a literary feast as a classic of the day."

J. F. LILLY, of Wright, Lilly & Co., Financial Agents, Colorado Springs, writes:

"The first volume of the Edition de Luxe of 'The Art and Literature of Business' has been read with much interest and profit. I consider this volume well worth the price it cost. Any young man contemplating a business career should make a careful study of advertising — the new force — and I have failed to hear of any set of books containing as comprehensive and authorized statements of the principles of advertising as this series. If there is anything better, the author will find me an easy victim."

CARL ABNER REAM, Advertising Agent, Canton, Ohio, says:

"I consider 'The Art and Literature of Business' a masterpiece, and don't think any person engaged in business of any nature whatever can afford to be without it."

The price of the six volumes, complete, is $25 cash, or in installments violation of law. In some States the reverse is true. In Arizona, for example, it is a punishable offense to sell doves that have been killed, but it is perfectly lawful to kill them—a curious piece of legislation.

This Building erected and occupied by one of the world's greatest advertisers, Mr. Robert Ramsey, publisher of the New York Ledger, now contains the most complete and efficient advertising plant in America. Five floors are occupied by cylinder and job press rooms, paper stock rooms, composing room; art, literary and publication departments, general offices and newspaper and magazine advertising agency. The advertising school is on the third floor and has the benefit of the special skill and knowledge in every department of the entire business.

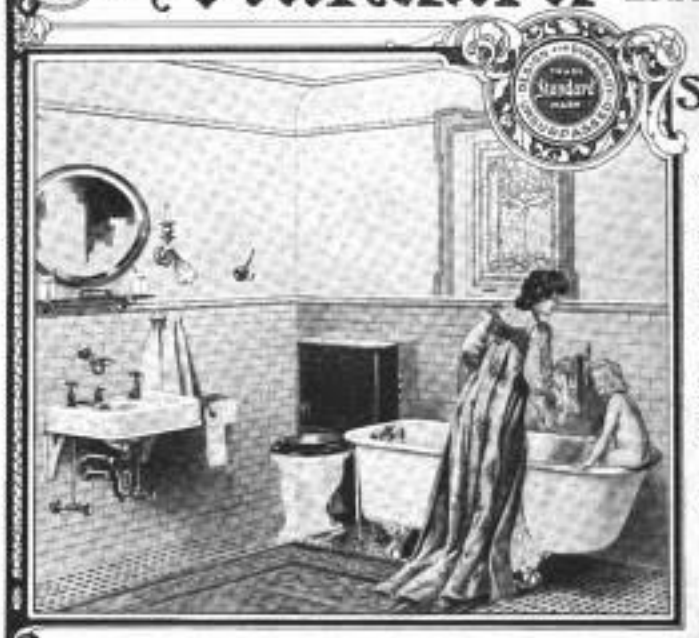
Added to all this confusion is the utter diversity in the dates and extent of open seasons. The work, therefore, of the United States deputy marshals, whose business it is to seize unlawful interstate shipments of birds, is one requiring circumspection and the widest knowledge of game laws. Wherever practicable, the State warden is selected for the Federal position as well, frequently with very effective results. Evasions of the law are ingenious, and the Federal inspectors must be vigilant and shrewd. At a Mississippi River point, recently, a deputy marshal who had made a seizure of a large box of birds killed out of season was confronted by a very prominent and positive attorney. Strong language was used and both men got excited. The lawyer's advantage lay in his ready citation of confusing statutes. Dazed but not defeated the Federal official reached for his pistol pocket.

"Hold up," exclaimed the distinguished attorney, "I'll surrender the birds and waive the case rather than have you resort to force."

"That ain't a gun," said the deputy marshal, as he pushed the attorney away and produced a thick volume from his pocket, "it's worse than firearms; it's Palmer's compilation of the game laws of the whole country. If I can't prove my case from this book, you eat the birds. If I can, I confiscate them."

Appeal to the law calmed the attorney. The marshal, after elaborate search, was found to be in the right and the birds were sold at auction and the money turned into the State treasury. The United States Supreme Court holds that birds are the property of the commonwealth, so that the confiscation of birds illegally shot is merely the seizure of objects which at no time belonged to the ostensible owner.



Game and Plume Birds

It was learned not long ago that some one was shipping plume birds from a Gulf State in violation of Federal law. Investigation disclosed that the chief offender was an eminent citizen—in fact, the clerk of the court before which his offense would have to be tried. When he learned that an indictment had been issued against him by the Grand Jury he confessed fully, paid all fines and costs and called off his hunters. Later, an official was sent along the coast to see if any one else had taken up the illegal work. A fisherman was questioned.

"Any good gull shooting here, you say? No, sir. Plenty of gulls, but no shooting," he replied. "You see, some of them Washington officials discovered a law protectin' the birds and threatened to make it hot for any one found killin' 'em. Since then there ain't been nothin' doin' in the gull line, I can tell ye."

The authorities have learned that it is a common practice in many parts of the United States for dealers in game birds to send agents into the country where quail are abundant to engage in clandestine trapping. The men are dressed to look like farm hands. The lining of their coats, however, is provided with capacious pockets. They all carry a patent net. This is set for quail and baited with wheat. When the birds hop into the net for the food, the operator, concealed in adjacent bushes, pulls a string which closes the mouth of the contrivance. He thereupon wrings the necks of his covey, walks to another spot and repeats the performance. Toward evening, with his day's catch stuffed inside his big coat, he makes for the nearest town, where he purchases small paper bags in which he wraps his quail. He next gets a soap or candle box, or some similar receptacle, and ships the game to his firm, ostensibly engaged in general merchandise trade. Great quantities of quail have been gathered in this way during the close season, but now the authorities are watching the system narrowly. A number of seizures have been made, but thus far the field men have evaded capture. They are careful to omit any markings that would point to identification by the officials, a simple number or cabalistic sign affording the dealers the knowledge of the particular agent who consigned the birds, but offering no clue to the game wardens. In these cases it has not been possible thus far to hold the consignees responsible. They simply state that they have no knowledge of the sender of the quail and disclaim any business relationship with him.

The CADILLAC

Up the Steps of the National Capitol

The Cadillac is a wonderful hill climber, taking grades with high gears that some machines of twice the horse-power can not negotiate even at low speed. The feat of climbing the steps of the Capitol at Washington—an almost prohibitive grade—is evidence of not only great power, but indicates a marvelous control.

The Cadillac is the automobile that solves the problem of safe, rapid and agreeable motor travel under all conditions of road and weather. Most powerful engine; most sensitive steering device; most reliable brakes; most flexible running gear—strong and graceful body.

Runabout $750.
With tonneau seating four, ALL FACING FORWARD, $850. Buggy top, $30.

The result of the work on the part of Doctor Palmer and his assistants is stimulating the entire country to protect all kinds of bird life. Congress has been impressed, and although it was understood at the beginning of the recent session that there was to be no alteration of the tariff, Secretary Wilson submitted a request to have the eggs of game birds intended for propagation placed on the free list, and it is now possible to secure permits to bring to this country eggs of the gallinæ (wild turkeys, grouse, capercailzie, pheasants, partridge and quail); the otididæ (or bustards); the rallidæ (rails and crakes); the anatidæ (swans, geese and ducks); and the tinamidæ (known as tinamous). Permits may be secured in advance of the arrival of the eggs, so as to avoid delay in the customs houses. It is required that applications state the number of each kind of eggs to be imported, the port of entry, and the purpose for which importation is made. The eggs are subject to inspection, and the authorities are empowered to destroy or return at the owner's expense any eggs brought in improperly.

A Concession to Local Opinion

Education in bird protection is now gradually spreading, but progress, until the Government took up the subject, had been slow. For more than one hundred years there was no interstate regulation of the traffic, and in consequence several species of game birds, notably the wood-duck and the woodcock, are vanishing, while numberless millions of plume birds have been slaughtered for the milliners. The result is that there has been a steadily decreasing number of snowy herons and other water birds in many localities. Egrets and terns have suffered the most, their extermination having been nearly effected along much of the Southern and Eastern seaboard.

It was the hope of the American ornithologists that absolute protection would be secured for all non-game birds excepting the English sparrow. To that end a law was framed and introduced into the various legislatures in the country. Uniformity, however, could not be secured, and to obtain protection of any kind it was necessary to make many concessions to local opinion.

A few weeks ago, in the legislature of one of the States that since the beginning of 1903 have joined in the national movement for bird protection, a rural statesman rose and uttered an impassioned philippic against the chewink. His crops had suffered grievously and the chewink he believed to be at the bottom of his troubles. He would vote for protection for all other species, but this bird, despite the good reputation it enjoyed in the textbooks, was, he declared, an enemy of husbandry. So they compromised on the chewink, and now that little bird for the first time in its career is on the black list.

Nevada has taken a novel step in spreading sentiment in favor of bird protection. Going upon the old adage that every boy is a natural-born student of birds and not conspicuously gentle in his methods of acquiring knowledge, the legislature of that State has passed a law making bird study compulsory in the schools. At least once every month teachers must give instruction on the subject and twice every term must read in full to the children the law protecting birds. Teachers cannot draw their pay unless they have complied with these provisions. Many of the States have set aside one day in the year as Bird Day. Iowa, which seems to be prominent in all national affairs, had pioneers in the new movement for bird protection. In fact, the law which gives the Government authority in regulating bird traffic was introduced by Representative Lacey of that State.

Dr. C. Hart Merriam, Chief of the Biological Survey, and Dr. A. K. Fisher, Assistant Chief, have so directed laboratory investigations that their bureau has become of far-reaching economic importance. The demands for some of the bird publications of their department exceed the circulation of the most popular novels. Field and laboratory scientists are sent out to live on farms and there have made and are making painstaking and original investigations into the habits of birds. This work is proving of great value to agriculture.

Recently a lover of birds protested against the number killed for scientific purposes.

"In the National Museum," replied Doctor Fisher, "there are 150,000 stuffed birds. These the Government has been fifty-nine years collecting. Prior to the general movement for the protection of birds it was not an infrequent thing for 150,000 song birds alone to be killed annually in a single county in many parts of the United States."

It's Easy to Shake Off the Coffee Habit

There are many people who make the humiliating acknowledgment that they are dependent upon Coffee to "brace them up" every little while. These have never learned the truth about Postum Cereal Coffee, which makes leaving off coffee a simple matter and brings health and strength in place of coffee ills. A lady of Davenport, Iowa, who has used Postum Food Coffee for five years, is competent to talk upon the subject. She says:

"I am a school teacher and during extra work when I thought I needed to be braced up I used to indulge in rich, strong coffee, of which I was very fond and upon which I thought I was dependent.

"I began to have serious heart palpitation and at times had sharp pains around the heart and more or less stomach trouble. I read about Postum and got some to try. I dropped coffee, took up the Postum and it worked such wonders for me that many of my friends took it up.

"In a short time I was well again, even able to attend evening socials. And I did not miss my coffee at all. Now I can truthfully say that I have been repaid fully for the change I made. I have no indications of heart disease and not once in the past four years have I had a sick headache or bilious spell.

"My father, 78 years old, is a Postum enthusiast and feels that his good health in a large measure is due to the 6 cups of good Postum which he enjoys each day." Name furnished by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There is a reason.

The Reading Table

"SHE was the saddest woman I ever knew," said Dr. Conyers Herring, running his fingers through his gray hair. We had breakfasted together and were burning our cigars in his study.

"The first time I saw her was in her studio in the Impasse du Maine. I don't know how it is, but almost every American artist has lived, sometime or other, in the Impasse du Maine. Ah! what stories those old red barracks could tell—stories of success and failure and worse than failure. The Impasse du Maine and No. 9 Rue des Fourneaux—they both have stories to tell. When I first came to Paris, years ago, a great deal of my practice was among the American art-students and the American artists over in the Latin Quarter, so you need not wonder that I know these studios so well. It was over a year ago that this sad woman sent for me to come and see her in her studio in the Impasse du Maine. I knew the name well: Mrs. X——'s. I am a Georgia man, myself. Her little daughter, Susan, was ill. It was nothing much, and in a few days the child was on her feet. But Mrs. X—— told me a great deal about herself. Her husband was in the telegraphic service in China. The baby was so young that she had not gone out with him. When she was left alone, there in the little Georgia home, she felt that she, too, should do something to 'help'—that is always the woman's word, 'help.'"

"I have heard it over in the Quarter," said I.

"Yes," Dr. Conyers Herring went on, "we have all heard it in the Quarter. But about Ida X——. Some fool had seen her water-colors, her schoolgirl landscapes, and told her she was an artist. That was enough; she came to Paris. She brought the baby, of course, and an old negro woman, who had been her nurse. She entered one of the schools and the amiable professors predicted a grand future for her. And she studied and worked, worked. The negro nurse got homesick and left her, the baby fell ill—that was when I first met her.

"Her husband over in China sent her hopeful letters and money. Her professors praised her. She felt that she had outgrown the Latin Quarter and, so, she moved to the fashionable part of Paris and took an apartment somewhere in the Rue de Courcelles. She gave receptions and painted, always hopefully. Her tea was good," said the Doctor shaking his head, "but her pictures were quite impossible.

"Then war broke out in China," he continued, "and no letters came from her husband out there. She did not know if he were living or dead. So she went to China."

Dr. Conyers Herring lit a fresh cigar; and, as he smoked, I recalled the circumstances of Mrs. X——'s departure for the East. It was impossible that she should take the little girl with her, for Susan was only a trifle over twelve months old. She took the little one to Maurevert, in the Seine-et-Marne, and left her with an honest, kind peasant woman, Madeleine Gouillot by name. She paid three months' board in advance. Then she locked the door of her apartment in the Rue de Courcelles, left the keys with the concierge and went away. She sailed from Marseilles in the steamer bound for Yeddo; it was, if not the quickest, the cheapest route. Three months went by, six months. The old peasant woman in Maurevert had no news of the mother. She wrote to the house in the Rue de Courcelles and got no answer. She could not afford to keep the little child, for life is hard for the peasantry of France. With the little money she had she brought the child to Paris. At the house in the Rue de Courcelles she learned strange things.

The Japanese packet-boat on which Mrs. Carmilly sailed from Yokohama, bound for a Chinese port, was wrecked and she was one of the three passengers drowned.

The old nurse did not know what to do. She was too poor to keep the little girl and she went to ask the advice of Monsieur Michaut, Police Commissioner for the Quarter of the Plaine-Monceau. And it was upon his advice that she sent the child to the Foundlings' Home. The little one is there to-day. She has been entered under the name of "Suzanne X——."

Some day, out of that confusion of yellow massacre and white loot that is known as China the father may come back to look for his little girl. She is not lost to him; she is only waiting. If he does not come—but it is better not to think of the future life of that baby foundling.

"The wretched story," said the Doctor angrily; "it makes me sick at heart to think of it—art, art, what has a woman with a baby to do with paint and canvas! She has already produced her masterpiece. But there is nothing to be done about it—there never is anything to be done about it. Come, let us get out into the air."

So he tucked me into his automobile and spun me homeward through the Champs-Elysées, and as we spun we talked of other things, but both of us I fear thought of the small Suzanne and the life that is in front of her.

Perhaps, after all, Mr. Gladstone was right when he said on a famous occasion: "Art is not worth while." —Vance Thompson.

Secretary Root to Governor Taft

A FEW weeks ago a cablegram was received at the War Department from Governor Taft at Manila stating that he was not feeling well and that he was preparing to start for Benguet, a resort in the great Caraballo chain of mountains. A few days later a reassuring message was received at Washington announcing that the Governor of the Philippines was very much improved. Soon after a personal cablegram came for Secretary Root, between whom and the Governor there is the warmest friendship and admiration. It was as follows:

"Rode two thousand feet up a mountain in Luzon to-day on horseback. Feeling fine."

The mountains of Luzon are steep, the sun is hot, the horses are small, and the Governor of the Philippines is a man of huge physique, weighing two hundred and seventy-five pounds. Secretary Root upon reading the message wrote and sent the following cablegram:

"Governor Taft,
"Benguet, P. I.
"How's the horse?

"ROOT."

MAY

By George Horton

It is springtime again and the hollows
Are lush with the undulate wheat;
There is life in the leap of the swallows
And the smell of the plowing is sweet;
Love is learning to walk and he follows
Queen May, or she steadies his feet.

You may know when the fair couple passes
By the blossoms that spring on the plain,
By the cowslips that gild the morasses
And the poppies that burn in the grain—
And the hearts of the lads and the lasses
Are faint with a strange, sudden pain!

You may know by the buds that are riven
Till the world is an orchard in bloom,
And the wind-beaten petals are driven
Abroad with the subtle perfume,
That each year for a thousand has striven
To conjure dead Youth from its tomb.

To-day as I walked in the yellow
Sweet rain that the locust tree flings,
I heard far above me the mellow
And infinite murmur of wings:
'Twas the bees with their violoncello
And their harp of a thousand strings!

May is coining her new dandelions
And has rented the earth for a while;
The crocus and wandering scions
Of Arbutus her laughter beguile,
She weeps and a million Orions
Are ablaze in the light of her smile!

Next month is the season to marry,
As any sweet country girl knows,
And May, the benevolent fairy,
Is bringing full many a rose—
Till the temple is lit she will tarry,
And will give June the keys when she goes.

7% INTEREST TO YOU

Substantial Investments that pay seven per cent. are not numerous.

It is double the ordinary bank rate of interest. Most shrewd investors are glad to get 5 per cent. and know that their money is safe. We are offering for public subscription a stock bearing 7 per cent. interest per annum, and an investment as reliable, we believe, as any bank in the country.

A limited amount of the 7 per cent. First Lien Preferred Stock of the

is offered for public subscription, subject to prior sale. Preferred as to assets, cumulative as to dividends.

Selling at par $100. a share

Magnolia Anti-Friction Metal is famous the world over, and is used as a lining for machinery bearings of all kinds. Leading manufacturers in all parts of the country have stated over their signatures, that Magnolia Metal is far superior to higher-priced babbitts.

A recent report of William Leslie & Co., chartered accountants, shows that the Company has earned, during the past five years,

An Average Annual Net Profit of Over $40,000

The present issue of Preferred Stock is for the purpose of increasing the working capital to enable the company to keep up with the tremendous demand for its products.

The requirements of the New York Stock Exchange have been complied with in the preparation of the stock, and application will be made for listing on the Stock Exchange after the $200,000 seven per cent. first lien Preferred Stock has been allotted.

If you have money to invest, write for full particulars, including separate and special agreement, and for chartered accountants' report and prospectus.

The Young Woman in Business

By Mrs. George Benedict Carpenter

THE typical, and perhaps the average, young society woman is a daintily nourished creature whose life is sheltered and brightened by the luxuries which go with wealth and by the devotion of admiring friends and relatives. Yet, no matter how secure her social position, she can never be quite sure that the day will not come when she will be called upon suddenly to face the problem of self-support, to plunge into the great world struggle for livelihood, to change her society gown for the harsh and irksome harness of business responsibility.

Nothing could be said from a purely theoretical standpoint which would serve to give practical help to a woman brought suddenly to confront so startling a change in every environment of her life. It is because I have actually passed through such a change that I have been asked to write of this possibility which hangs over the life of every woman in society. The fact that conclusions and advice in this line, to be of the slightest practical value, must be drawn from personal experience, will obviate any apology for the personal note which must necessarily appear in dealing with this subject. No young woman could possibly enter the struggle of business life with a more complete lack of training for its responsibilities than that which I possessed when the sudden and untimely death of my husband left me to grapple with the problem of supporting a family of young children and carrying forward the large enterprise in which he had staked years of work and all his hopes of success.

A girlhood spent in a home of wealth and refinement, the unstinted devotion of family and friends, and a secure place in the best society of a large city formed an environment ill calculated to prepare me for serious responsibilities of any kind. Up to the time of my marriage I was unfamiliar with the use of the needle and work was an unknown field of activity. This is sufficient to indicate my unpreparedness for business life—unless it be added that my new home was supplied with almost the same comforts and luxuries with which I had been surrounded since childhood. Suddenly, almost in a day, the support of that home was stricken by death, and the task of adequate provision for my children fell upon my own shoulders.

The Question of Good to be Gained

Recalling the impression which that outlook made upon my mind and which the experiences of subsequent months and years confirmed, I cannot express the slightest sympathy with the sentiment that the stroke of destiny which compels a woman of society to go into business life is a blessing in disguise. Some argue that it would be commendable for the society woman of wealth and standing voluntarily to engage in the grind of business affairs for the sake of the discipline which such contact with the stern realities of life would bring. This seems to me little short of sheer nonsense. From a business experience of about twelve years I can say that any woman who leaves the wholesome pleasures of a good home for the battle of business is to be sincerely commiserated. Such a change may be in the line of "inscrutable providence," but to all human appearances it is a calamity to be endured with fortitude.

On one point, however, the woman who is compelled to leave the drawing-room and the home need have no fears. If her social position has been reasonably secure it will not be affected by the change in her financial circumstances and the necessity of giving to business the energy and attention which she formerly devoted to receptions, balls and the whole round of social duties. Of this I have had the most substantial proof. Although compelled suddenly to relinquish almost every active social relationship and throw all my energies into the enterprise with which I found myself identified, I did not thereby lose a single invitation or greeting. Not a person, from the nearest friend to the most formal of society acquaintances, altered his or her attitude toward me in the slightest by reason of the change which came into my mode of life. This applies to every period of my business career, from the first day when I shouldered a somewhat undefined but no less onerous responsibility to the hour when I put aside the world of affairs to devote myself exclusively to my home interests.

This is not to be accounted for on the basis that social lines are alleged to be less severely drawn in Chicago than in Eastern cities, or that there is here a broader democracy in what are termed the "higher circles" than elsewhere. Without attempting to discuss the invidious question as to whether the West is less discriminating than the East in its social standards, I am thoroughly convinced that the sentiment which makes social position secure beyond the fluctuations of personal fortune is broadly American and as characteristic of the Atlantic seaboard as of the old South or the new West. The history of one New York family will illustrate and enforce this view of the matter better than paragraphs of argument. Every detail of this plucky struggle against adverse fortune is as familiar to me as if it had taken place in my own home.

Facing the World with Bravery

The father of four daughters who had been reared in luxury and belonged to a finely exclusive social set suddenly lost his entire fortune—a very large one—and then passed away. Only one of these young women had married. The others—Elizabeth, Julia and Agnes—found themselves confronted with the problem of self-support. In the rare judgment and common-sense with which they mastered it are to be found a score of intensely practical lessons for those in somewhat similar situations. They also furnish conclusive proof that the society ethics and usages of New York do not call upon a woman to sacrifice her social position as a penalty for entering the lists of self-supporting women any more than do those of Chicago. All three of these young women had lived the typical society life of the more refined and cultivated kind. Their "set" was by no means the most brilliant or dashing in the city, but it was certainly exclusive, intellectual and artistic to a marked degree and not lacking in gayety. The life of these young women had been full of pleasure, and they had many friends to whom they were devoted. To give all these up seemed impossible, and they determined not to do so unless it became plain that this was an inevitable result of the sad change in their circumstances.

At the first hint of misfortune all of the young women began to practice economies to which they had been strangers from girlhood. The fine old city mansion was relinquished for a neat little home in one of the suburbs; Julia trimmed the season's hats for the trio, and Agnes, the youngest, announced that she would take the responsibilities of mistress of the home and do all the work herself, provided she were allowed to run the establishment absolutely as she pleased. This stipulation was readily agreed to—but from whence were the "sinews of war" to come? Agnes could not maintain a house without at least a little money, and the slender residue of pin money which still remained in their possession was fast dwindling. Something must be done, and done quickly! While the plucky trio struggled with this problem, its solution came in apparently an accidental way. The home-trimmed hats caught the fancy of a very fastidious friend who asked the name of the milliner who had designed them. Blushingly Julia told her secret. The friend at once pressed the young designer to take a commission. This was laughingly accepted and fulfilled with such originality and good taste that the "creation" was a phenomenal success. Immediately other commissions came to the astonished Julia and the parlor of the little home was soon converted into a busy shop. At the start the patrons fixed the prices, and insisted upon paying what the hats would have cost them at the shops of the best milliners.

The Artist Who Designed Fine Waists

Elizabeth, the eldest sister, had attended art schools from childhood and considered painting to be her special forte. Her artistic sense was well developed. Of course her first thought, when the calamity came upon the family, was that she would turn her art to serious purpose and enter the lists of "real painters" dependent upon the brush for support. But she saw that the little milliner had her hands more than full and generously volunteered to "help out in the rush."

WESTERN EMPIRE, 90 Times Building, Los Angeles.

Soon she announced to her astonished sisters that she would much rather be a real artist in the line of hats and waists than a would-be painter in a studio; consequently she proposed to go into the business of designing and making bodices. The business quickly outgrew the home and the young women rented a modest shop in a portion of the city convenient for their patrons. Scores of fashionable friends at once brought not only their orders but their friends. Steadily the little shop grew and prospered until it is now an establishment the name of which carries weight and authority in fashionable circles in New York.

But how about the social life of these courageous young women? Herein is the main point in my story! It was seldom that more than one of the trio could be spared at one time to make a round of calls; but the one who did go took the cards of the others and saw that their entire calling list was punctiliously remembered. Not a social debt was left unpaid.

Before the finances of this household of self-supporting society girls reached a condition which warranted the keeping of a servant, they did not deem it necessary entirely to give up the entertainment of their friends. Some of the most delightful teas and dinners I have ever attended were not only prepared but also served by Agnes, the youngest of the three sisters. She wore a fresh piqué dress with round neck and elbow sleeves—quite the appropriate costume in which to discharge her matronly duties—and looked as bewitching as her more elaborately gowned sisters. And not one of their old friends deserted them because the two older sisters had gone into business or because the youngest had done the domestic work for the household.

Advantages of Practical Business

There are three or four very significant and practical lessons to be learned from the experience of these young women. One is that it is far better for a woman to go into a business, no matter how plain and unesthetic, than attempt to make a place in an artistic profession unless she be so phenomenally gifted as to be an unmistakable genius.

The eldest daughter might have made a scant living at painting; but she would now be the first to insist that she could not possibly have achieved the financial success which has rewarded her efforts as a designer and maker of hats and bodices. In all the artistic pursuits—the stage, concert, lecture and entertainment work, portrait and landscape painting and illustrating—competition is so strong and exacting, and the rarest natural gifts must be strengthened by so severe and comprehensive a technical training, that it is almost hopeless for a young woman who has been trained only for social life and its enjoyments to enter the race.

As to the influence, upon the character and bearing of a young woman, of the environments of a business life as compared with those which surround a public artist—an actress, for example—I do not hesitate to say that she has a far better chance to preserve her delicate womanliness "unspotted from the world" in almost any commercial pursuit than in a public artistic career. This does not imply that she need sacrifice her femininity if she goes on the stage or on the entertainment platform. It must be admitted, however, that the atmosphere of a business office of almost any kind is more wholesome, more normal, and less infected by the poison of flattery than is the stage or the platform. And the chances of success in most branches of business are, on the average, much better than those in a highly esthetic profession.

Before losing sight of this family of New York society girls let me emphasize a point already slightly touched upon. In discussing their business career in a confidential chat one of these young women said:

"My friends have often asked me if, in view of the success achieved and the knowledge of the world gained in the struggle, I am not glad that we were compelled to go into business. From the bottom of my heart I answer them 'No!'"

This will be the verdict of every woman who has known the joys of a good home and a circle of pleasant friends, but has been forced by circumstance to join the army of earners. No woman whose experience covers both sides of this problem and who speaks frankly will hesitate to deplore the necessity which sends any woman, young or old, into the struggle for a livelihood.

I have said that no woman could have less training available for use in business than I had when called upon to enter the lists. Perhaps this statement should be qualified, as

DIAMONDS ON CREDIT

THE loved one's emblem of her betrothal should be a Diamond solitaire ring. In addition to being beautiful it should be valuable. The giver should remember that it is a life-gift; that it lasts forever and every day reminds the wearer of the giver and his generosity. He should also remember that it will be one of the best investments to which money can be put, for Diamonds have increased in value steadily, year after year. On the LOFTIS SYSTEM the most beautiful Diamond rings, brooches, studs, lockets, earrings, cuff-buttons, watches, etc., may be bought on the INVESTMENT PLAN. You simply select the article from our beautifully illustrated catalogue, and it will be delivered at your door with all express charges paid. Only one-fifth of the price need be paid at first; the balance falling due in a series of small payments extending over eight months. No interest is charged; no security is required and no publicity is created when you open a CONFIDENTIAL CHARGE ACCOUNT with us. When you make a selection it is always upon the distinct understanding that your money will be promptly returned in case you decide not to purchase. We are the largest concern in the business and one of the oldest (Established 1858). We sell only the finest Diamonds, and our prices are from ten to twenty per cent. lower than those of other dealers. Every Diamond is sold under a written guarantee of quality and value, and at any time in the future will be accepted at full price in exchange for other goods or a larger Diamond. Our Confidential Credit System is open to all honest persons, without regard to their financial worth; but to those who prefer to pay cash we make the most astounding and liberal offer ever made. It is no less than guaranteeing the return of all money paid—less ten per cent., at any time within one year. Please write for our Catalogue, which fully illustrates our beautiful goods, quotes the lowest prices, and explains our popular system in every detail. We also send a Souvenir Booklet which is worth its weight in gold to any person interested in Diamonds. We refer to your local bank—step in and ask them to tell you how we stand in the business world. They will consult their Dun or Bradstreet book of commercial ratings, and tell you that no house stands higher in credit, responsibility or promptness.

that faculty most cultivated in my experience in society was the one which stood me in greatest stead in business affairs. More than all else, society life cultivates tact, and this was the weapon which I found in my hands at the outset of my business career and with which I fought my way. At the beginning I was fearful that I should not be able to meet business men in the manner in which they were accustomed to being met by men, and that this would give them cause to be dissatisfied.

So greatly did this trouble me that I determined to seek the counsel of a business man in whose judgment I had the utmost confidence. I knew that my work must stand upon results alone and I could afford to make no mistake. As a family friend, the late Mr. George M. Pullman advised me and said: "By all means go into the undertaking. Tact and good common-sense are fundamental elements in business success. When these dictate a course and the manner in which it is to be followed, it will make no difference if it is not quite the regular masculine way of procedure. It will win just the same."

A Woman's Way is as Good as a Man's

Very soon I was able to prove the soundness of this observation, for I found that I had a woman's way of dealing with problems and that this was accepted in the business world quite as readily as the masculine way—far more readily than a feminine imitation of a man's manner of handling business affairs would be. In order to give a clear idea of the general principles of procedure which I worked out, a personal statement is not to be avoided. The interests which I was called upon to administer were very complex and often conflicting. I succeeded my husband as agent and manager of the Central Music Hall Building and also as lessee of its auditorium, then the largest of its class in Chicago.

He had organized this enterprise and the building was completed less than one year before his death.

Big problems soon ceased to terrify me. I met with opposition, within and without the combination of capitalists owning the building, but had the satisfaction of paying the shareholders an annual dividend ranging from twenty to twenty-four per cent. on the original stock of the corporation. Movements to displace me in order to give the position to some man who exerted strong influence occasionally came to my attention, and they simply aroused my energies and gave zest to a game of honorable diplomacy. On the other hand, however, I was never able to shake off the unpleasant realization of the fact that I was compelled to learn the business from an employee. The secretary who had faithfully and efficiently served my husband from the very inception of the enterprise naturally had all the details of the business at her fingers' ends. In view of this fact I was keenly conscious that whatever might be the success of my venture it would always be clouded by the realization that I had not personally laid its foundations, and organized and developed it. This was decidedly a woman's way of looking at the matter. A man might say that such thoughts were wholly uncalled for and that I gave myself needless trouble on that score. Certain it is, however, that this one thing was a greater trial to me than all the big problems which I had to confront during my service in the capacity named.

In other particulars, too, I was brought to the conclusion that the feminine tendency is to think more about small details than big, broad problems, and in general to allow the little things to cause far more anxiety than the large ones.

During this time I carefully maintained my social relationships. Although able to give no time to calling in the daytime, I looked after my calling list with strict attention and maintained it intact. Some two or three times a year I entertained my friends in my home.

Editor's Note—This is the first of two papers on The Young Woman in Business. The second and concluding paper will appear next week.

FROM CHICAGO TO DENVER
At an Increase of $500 per Year, through
SHATTUCK'S INTERNATIONAL BUREAU

I am pleased to acknowledge the efficiency of your service and to commend the methods of your Bureau. On March 23d the day I became a member of your Bureau, I was employed by a large department store in the City of Chicago as an advertising writer. Within two weeks after registration you offered me four positions at salaries ranging from $1500.00 to $2500.00 per year. On April 2nd I accepted the position which I now hold as Manager of the Detweiler Advertising Agency of this city. You have increased my salary $500.00 per annum. I can earnestly recommend Shattuck's International Bureau to all who are desirous of bettering their positions.
Very truly yours, J. M. Naughton Brown Palace, Denver, Colo.

EMPLOYEE—Shattuck's Bureau offers you an exceptional opportunity. It finds the exact position you are capable of filling. Have you outgrown your present position? HOW Can I Convince You that I have absolutely sound securities?

If you will let me prove to you, in any way you like, that these securities are gilt edged and rock-ribbed, guaranteed to net 5 per cent., without the chance of losing a cent, I can sell them to you.

I would be glad to have you make the most careful and scrutinizing search of my record—find out whether I will do just as I agree to or not. I will assist you in every way, or would be glad to have you inquire through any source not proposed by me. You will find me safe, honorable, reliable and responsible. I will personally see to it that you do not regret making an investment in North Dakota, if you make it through me.

I own and offer the following gilt-edge farm mortgages, to net purchaser 5 per cent. per annum:

$3,000, 5 years	$1,400, 5 years

leader and society favorite must have a big social pull. So she gave a dinner expressly in his honor, and, at my advice, he went there with some toy walking bugs and mice in his pockets and set them going on the table just as they were finishing the dessert. The papers gave him a lot of space on it—thanks to my exertions—and Mrs. Titepurse, who of course got her name in as the hostess (we published her picture as well), was perfectly delighted and felt that she was really getting along. Timpson saw his chance, too, and the next thing I knew he came running to me with a new photograph of Kitty Titepurse—we were well stocked with his own—and told me he was engaged to her. Now, I wonder what he'll do for me, that made him."

"How much space do you expect to give to this affair to-morrow?" I inquired as we sat chatting together in the lobby, for like an experienced general the city editor would not leave the field until the dispersing crowds should tell him that the siege was over and he might withdraw his forces.

"How much space?" he repeated musingly. "Let me see. Swallowtail will do a couple of columns, and your friend, Mrs. Foxglove—a bright little woman that, by the way—as many more from her point of view. Then of course we'll have a list of everybody there and their clothes. Swallowtail and Foxglove will do that between them with the help of the men we've got outside in the street, and that'll make three columns more. A column and a half for the reception and as much more for the presents, and a couple of columns about the Titepurses and young Timpson, together with the photographs, will about let us out. Of course we'll have pictures of the bride and bridegroom and old Titepurse and the house where he was born up in the backwoods and the house he's given to his daughter and the church she's married in. I 'spose the whole thing'll make nearly three pages in all. And the funny part of it all is that to-morrow morning a lot of the real blue bloods of the town will lay down their papers, looking half scared, and say, 'Who in the world are these people?'"

On the Sunday after the wedding I met Mrs. Foxglove as she was going out to church—she's as devout a little soul as ever lived—and we walked down the street together; by no means a bad-looking couple nor one marked by any absurd disparity of age.

"I can't tell you how grateful I am to you," she said seriously. "I'm making more money on the Planet than I ever did anywhere before, and I'm learning ever so much about the newspaper business. Another thing that I've learned, too, is that there are more good, sweet-minded, womanly women in New York society than I ever had any idea of. Oh, you needn't laugh; that Mrs. Fenwick-Bertram that you said such mean things about asked me to stop to lunch with her the minute I told her I was on the Planet, and gave me a beautiful photograph of herself which she said I could print in the paper if I wanted to, and the next time they have a party she's going to give me a full list of the names, though she's always tried to avoid publicity. I'm sure she does it just to help a young Southern woman who is trying hard to make her living."

We parted at the corner and I went my way wondering whether my efforts in behalf of this misguided woman were to be in vain.

A Long Sitting

SENATOR MCCREARY, of Kentucky, was a member of the House of Representatives for a long time, retiring in 1894 to return to Washington as a member of the Senate on March 4 last. A few days before he was sworn in he went into the room of the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

"It was eighteen years to a day from the time I first went into that room," said the Senator, in speaking of the incident. "When I made my first visit there were four men in the room—Senators Allison, of Iowa; Cockrell, of Missouri; Teller, of Colorado, and Hale, of Maine. This time, eighteen years later, the same four sat in the room, in almost identically the same places they occupied when I first saw them, and they looked as if they had been sitting there doing the nation's business all that time."

Through all the Crush with Perfect Ease

An accomplishment possible only in an automobile so simple and sensitive, in its control and steering mechanism, that it responds like a living thing to the driver's wishes. That automobile is the

Winton

Absolute control of the car is assured by the Winton method of motor government which is simplicity itself. A little spring button under the driver's right foot operates the air-governor, which controls the speed of the motor. When the pressure upon this button is increased the motor speeds up and the car forges ahead. Release the pressure, the motor slows down and the car speed diminishes. You get any desired variation by the use of this throttle button. The method is so simple and effective that the driver increases or decreases speed of car without conscious effort. There is no automobile manufactured or sold in America which combines so many features of real excellence. The Winton is a practical result of long experience thoroughly tried out. It is of clever design, beautifully finished, and the entire correctness of our horizontal, double opposed cylinder motor is being demonstrated daily to the complete satisfaction of the very best mechanical minds.

The price of this superb 20 horse-power car complete with detachable tonneau, full brass side lamps, tools, etc., is $2500.00.

Visit any of our branch or agency depots in all leading cities, and the features of Winton excellence will be demonstrated.

Selz Royal Blue

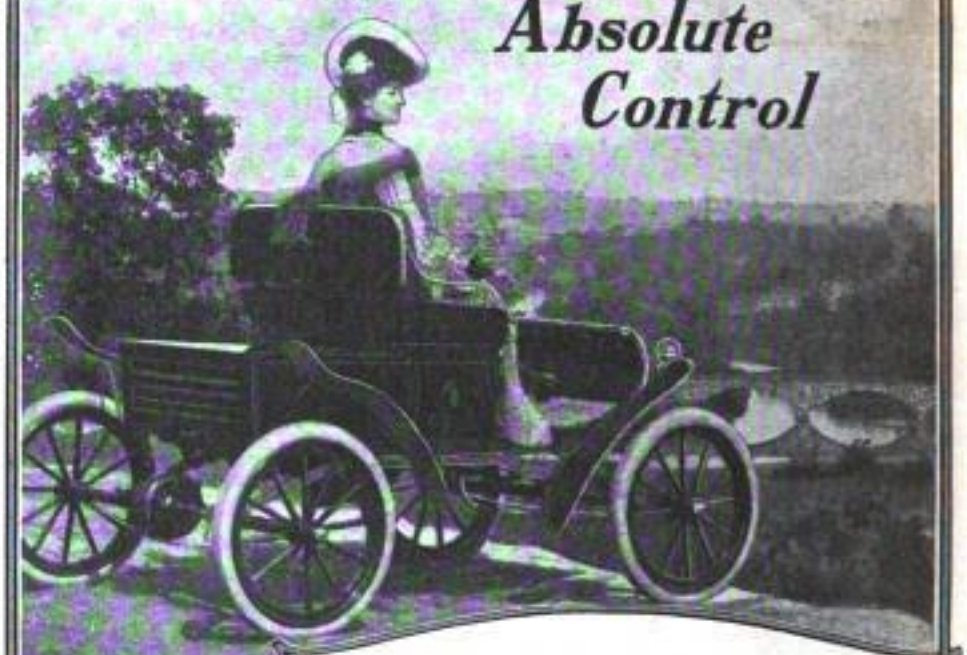
"THE SOLE OF HONOR"

For summer wear here's a low shoe that's not only stylish, but comfortable; 1 because it's cool; 2 because it's Selz.

Made of the best light patent colt skin, on our Stanford last; a very swagger shape. A little more pointed than Footform, with a little more "swing"; and the "Knob" on the toe, so much favored by stylish dressers this season. We have it, made on the Footform last also.

If you've never worn a Selz shoe, you have something to learn about shoe-quality and comfort; it's to your interest to learn it as soon as you can; and ours to have you: we're telling you about it now.

Ask your shoe-man for this one; if he hasn't it, ask him to get it; if he won't, get another shoe-man, or write to us.



Next time you buy rubbers, do yourself a favor; buy Selz Royal Blue Rubbers; for men, women, and children. Good dealers have them; better-than-usual rubbers.

THE CHIEF ENGINEER

The Love Story of a Patient Man

BY LLOYD OSBOURNE

EVERY OLD LADY WITHIN A RADIUS OF THREE MILES REGARDED THE MATCH AS GOOD AS SETTLED

FRANK RIGNOLD had never been the favored suitor, not at least so far as anything definite was concerned; but he had always been welcome at the little house on Commonwealth Street, and amongst the neighbors his name and that of Florence Fenacre were coupled as a matter of course, and every old lady within a radius of three miles regarded the match as good as settled. It was not Frank's fault that it was not, for he was deeply in love with the widow's daughter and looked forward to such an end to their acquaintance as the very dearest thing fate could give him. But in these affairs it is necessary to carry the lady with you—and the lady, though she had never said "no," had not yet been prevailed upon to say "yes." In fact, she preferred to leave the matter as it was, and boldly forestalling a set proposal, had managed to convey to Frank Rignold that it was her wish he should not make one.

"Let us be good friends," she would say, "and as for anything else, Frank, there's plenty of time to consider that by and by. Isn't it enough already that we like each other?"

Frank did not think it was enough, but he was not without intuition and willing to accept the little offered him and be grateful—rather than risk all, and almost certainly lose all, by too exigent a suit. For Florence Fenacre was the acknowledged beauty of the town, with a dozen eligible men at her feet, and was more courted and sought after than any girl in the place. The place, to give it its name, was Standhurst, one of those dead-and-alive little ports on the Atlantic seaboard, with a dozen factories, a few decaying wharves, and that tranquil air of having had a past.

The widow and her pretty daughter lived in a low-roofed, red-brick house that faced the street and sheltered a long, deep, shady garden in the rear. Land and house had been bought with whale oil. Their little income, derived from the rent of three barren and stony farms and amounting to not more than sixty dollars a month, represented a capitalization of whale oil. Even the old gray church whither they went twice of a Sunday was whale oil, too, and had been built in bygone days by the sturdy captains who now lay all around it under slabs of stone. There amongst them was Florence's father and her grandfather and her great-grandfather, together with the Macys and the Coffins and the Cabotts with whom they had sailed and quarreled and loved and intermarried in the years now gone. The wide world had not been too wide for them to sail it round and reap the harvests of far off seas; but in death they lay side by side, their voyages done, their bones mingling in the New England earth.

Frank Rignold, too, was a son of Standhurst, and the sea which ran in that blood for generations bade him in manhood to rise and follow it. He had gone into the engine-room, and at thirty was the chief engineer of a cargo boat running to South American ports. He was a tall, fine-looking man with earnest gray eyes; a reader, a student, an observer; self-taught in Spanish, Latin and French; a grave, quiet, gentlemanly man, whose rare smile seemed to light his whole face, and who in his voyages South had caught something of Spanish grace and courtliness. He returned as regularly to Standhurst as his ship did to New York; and when he stepped off the train his eager steps took him first to the Fenacres' house, his hands never empty of some little present for his sweetheart.

On the occasion of our story his step was more buoyant than ever and his heart beat high with hope, for she had cried the last time he went away, and though no word of love had yet been spoken between them, he was conscious of her increasing inclination for him and her increasing dependence. Having already won so much it seemed as though his passionate devotion could not fail to turn the scale and bring her to that admission he felt it was on her lips to make. So he strode through the narrow streets, telling himself a fairy story of how it all might be, with a little house of their own and she waiting for him on the wharf when his ship made fast; a story that never grew stale in the repetition, but which, please God, would come true in the end, with Florence his wife, and all his doubtings and heart-aches over.

FLORENCE SWEPT AN OPERA CLOAK FROM A CHAIR AND MADE HIM SIT DOWN

Florence opened the door for him herself and gave a little cry of surprise and welcome as they shook hands, for in all their acquaintance there had never been a kiss between them. It was all he could do not to catch her in his arms, for as she smiled up at him, so radiant and beautiful and happy, it seemed as if it were his right, and that he had been a fool ever to have questioned her love for him. He followed her into the sitting-room, laughing like a child with pleasure, and thrilled through and through with the sound of her voice and the touch of her hand and the vague, subtle perfume of her whole being. His laughter died away, however, as he saw what the room contained. Over the chairs, over the sofa, over the table, in the stacked and open pasteboard boxes on the floor were dresses and gowns outspread with the profusion of a splendid shop, and even to his unknowing eyes costly and magnificent beyond anything he had ever seen before. Florence swept an opera cloak from a chair and made him sit down, watching him the while with a charming gayety and excitement.

"Florence," he said, almost with a gasp, "does this mean that you are going to be——?" He stopped short. He could not say that word.

"I'm never going to marry anybody," she returned.

"But——!" he began again.

"Then you haven't heard!" she cried, clasping her hands. "Oh, Frank, you haven't heard!"

"I have only just got back," he said.

"I've been left heaps of money," she exclaimed, "from my uncle, you know, the one that treated father so badly and tricked him out of the old manor farm. And it's not only a lot, Frank, but it's millions!"

He repeated the word with a kind of groan.

"They are probating the will for six," she went on, not noticing his agitation, "but I'm sure the lawyers are making it as low as they can for the taxes. And it's the most splendid kind of property—rows of houses in the heart of New York and big Broadway shops and skyscrapers! Frank, do you realize I own two office buildings twenty stories high!"

Frank tried to congratulate her on her wonderful good fortune, but it was like a voice from the grave and he could not affect to be glad at the death-knell of all his hopes.

"That let's me out," he said.

"My poor Frank, you never were in," she said, regarding him with great kindness and compassion. "I know you are disappointed, but you are too much a man to be unjust to me."

Digitized by Google

"Oh, I haven't the right to say a word," he exclaimed. "On your side it was friends and nothing more. I always understood that, Florence."

He was shocked at her almost imperceptible sigh of relief.

"Of course, this changes everything," she said.

"Yet it would have come if it hadn't been for this," he said. "You were getting to like me better and better. You cried when I last went away. Yes, it would have come, Florence," he repeated, looking at her wistfully.

"I suppose it would, Frank," she said.

"Oh, Florence," he exclaimed, and could not go on lest his voice should betray him.

"And we should have lived in a poky little house," she said, "and you would have been at sea three-quarters of the time, leaving me to eat my heart out as mother did for father—and it would have been a horrible, dreadful, irrevocable mistake."

"I didn't have to go to sea," he said, snatching at this crumb of hope. "There are other jobs than ships. Why, only last trip I was offered a refrigerating plant in Chicago!"

He did not tell her it carried a salary of four hundred dollars a month and that he had meant to lay it at her feet that morning. In the light of her millions that sum, so considerable an hour before, had suddenly shrunk to nothing. How puny and pitiful it seemed in the contrast. He had a sense that everything had shrunk to nothing—his life, his hopes, his future.

"I know you think I am cruel," she said, in the same calm, considerate tone she had used throughout. "But I never gave you any encouragement, Frank—not in the way you wanted or expected. You were the only person I knew who was the least bit cultivated and nice and traveled and out of the commonplace. I can't tell you how much you brightened my life here, or how glad I was when you came, or how sorry I was when you went away—but it wasn't love, Frank—not the love you wished for, or the love I feel I have the power to give."

"Why did you let me go on, then?" he broke out, "I getting deeper and deeper into it and you knowing all the time it never could come to anything? Just because no words were said, did that make you blind? If you were such a friend of mine as you said you were, wouldn't it have been kinder to show me the door and tell me straight out it was hopeless and impossible? Oh, Florence, you took my love when you wanted it, like a person getting warm at a fire, and now when you don't need it any longer you tell me quite unconcernedly that it is all over between us!"

"It would sound so heartless to tell you the real truth, Frank," she said.

"Oh, let me hear it," he said. "I'm desperate enough for anything—even for that, I suppose."

"I knew it would end the way you wanted it, Frank," she said. "You were getting to mean more and more to me. I did not love you exactly and I did not worry a particle when you were away, but I sort of acquiesced in what seemed to be the inevitable. I know I am horribly to blame, but I took it for granted we'd drift on and on—and this time, if you had asked me, I had made up my mind to say 'yes.'"

She said this last word in almost a whisper, frightened at the sight of Frank's pale face. She ran over to him, and throwing her arms around his neck kissed him again and again.

"We'll always be friends, Frank," she said. "Always, always!"

He made no movement to return her caresses. To be kissed out of pity humiliated him to the quick. He pushed her away from him, and when he spoke it was with a dignity and gentleness that surprised her.

"I was wrong to reproach you," he said. "I can appreciate what a difference all this money makes to you. It has lifted you into another world—a world where I cannot hope to follow you. I can be man enough to say that I understand—that I acquiesce—without bitterness."

"I never liked you so well as I do now, Frank," she said, her eyes filling with tears.

"We will say nothing more about it," he said. "I couldn't blame you because you don't love me, could I? I ought rather instead to thank you—thank you for so much you have given me these two years past—your friendship, your intimacy, your trust. That it all came to nothing was neither your fault nor mine. It was your uncle's for dying and leaving you skyscrapers!"

They both laughed at this, and Frank, now apparently quite himself again, brought forth his presents: a large box of candy, a beautifully bound little volume of Pierre Loti, and a lace collar he had picked up at Buenos Ayres. This last seemed a trifling piece of finery in the midst of all those dresses, though he had paid sixteen dollars for it and had counted it cheap at the price. Florence received it with exaggerated gratitude, genuine enough in one way for she was touched; but in spite of herself, her altered fortunes and the memory of those great New York shops where she had ordered right and left made the bit of lace seem common and scarce worth possessing. Even as she thanked him she was mentally presenting it to one of the poor Miss Browns who sang in the church choir.

They spent an hour in talking together, eluding on either side any further reference to the subject most in their thoughts, and finding safety in books and the little gossip of the place, and the news of the day. It might have been an ordinary call, though Frank, as a special favor, was allowed to smoke a cigar, and there was a wild, strained look in Florence's face that gave the lie to her previous professions of indifference. She knew she was violating her own heart, but her character was already corrupting under the breath of wealth, and her head was turned with dreams of social conquests and of a great and splendid match in the roseate future. She kept telling herself how lucky it was that the money had not come too late, and wondering at the same time whether she would ever again meet a man who had such a compelling charm for her as Frank Rignold, and whose mellow voice could so move her to the depths. At last, after a decent interval, Frank said he would have to leave and she accompanied him to the door, where he begged her to remember him to her mother and added something congratulatory about the great good fortune that had befallen her.

"And now good-by," he said.

"But you will come back, Frank?" she exclaimed anxiously, seeing through the smiling mask he wore.

"Oh, no!" he said. "I couldn't, Florence, I couldn't."

"I cannot let you go like this," she protested. "Really I can't, Frank. I won't!"

"I don't see very well how you can help it," he said brusquely.

"Surely my wish has still some weight with you," she said.

"Florence," he returned, holding her hand very tight, "you must not think it pique on my part or anything so petty and unworthy; but I'd rather stop right here than endure the pain of seeing you get more and more indifferent to me. It is bound to come, of course, and it would be less cruel this way than the other."

"You never can have loved me," she exclaimed. "Didn't I say I wanted to be friends? Didn't I kiss you?"

"Yes," he said slowly, "as you might a child, to comfort him for a broken toy. Florence," he went on, "I have wanted you for the last two years and now I have lost you. I must face up to that. I must meet it with what fortitude I can. But I cannot bear to feel that every time I come you will like me less; that others will crowd me out and take my place; that the gulf will widen and widen until at last it is impassable. I am going while you still love me a little and will miss me. Good-by!"

She leaned her head on his shoulder and sobbed. She had but to say one word to keep him, and yet she would not say it. Her heart seemed broken in her breast and yet she let him go, sustained in her resolve by the thought of her great fortune and of the wonderful days to come.

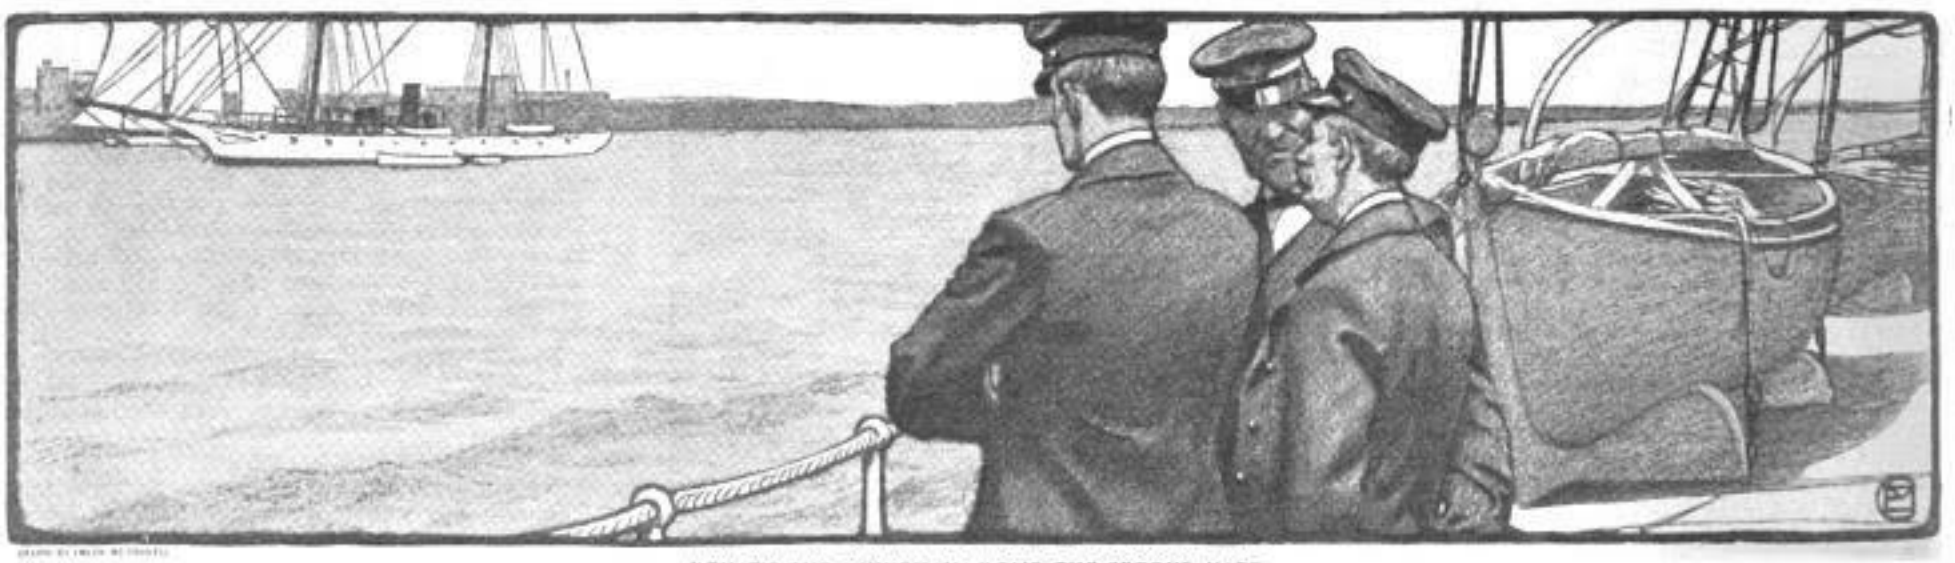
"Good-by," she said, and stood looking after him as he walked slowly away.

"Oh, that money, I hate it," she exclaimed to herself. "I wish he had never left it to me. I didn't want it or expect it or anything, and I should have been happy. Oh, so happy! Then, with a pang, she recalled the refrigerating plant and the life so quiet and poor and simple and sweet that she and Frank would have led had not her millions come between them.

"Her millions!"

It was inspiriting to repeat those two words to herself. It strengthened her resolve and made her feel how wise she had been to break with Frank. Perhaps, after all, it were better for him not to come back. He was right about the gulf between them, and even since his departure it was widening appreciably.

"I don't own all that money," she said to herself, realizing what all very rich people realize sooner or later. "It owns me!" And with that she went indoors and cried part of the forenoon and spent the rest of it in trying on her new clothes.



Wealth, if it did not bring happiness, at least brought some pleasant distractions.

II

IT WAS fully a year before Frank saw her again; a long year to him, soberly passed in his shipboard duties, with recurring weeks ashore at New York and Buenos Ayres. He had grown more reserved and silent than before; fonder of his books; keener in his taste for pure science. He avoided his old friends and made no new ones. The world seemed to be passing him while he stood still. He wondered how others could laugh when his own heart was so heavy, and he preferred to go his own way, solitary and unnoticed, taking an increasing pleasure in his isolation. He continued to write to Standhurst, for there were a few old friends whom he could not disregard altogether, though he made his letters as infrequent as he could and as short. In return he was kept informed of Florence's movements; of the sensation she made everywhere; of the great people who had taken her under their wing; of her rumored engagements; of her triumphs in Paris and London; of her yachts and horses and splendor and beauty. His correspondents showed an artless pride in the recital. It was becoming their only claim to consideration that they knew Florence Fenacre. Her dazzling life reflected a sort of glory upon themselves, and their letters ran endlessly on the same theme. It was all a modern fairy tale, and they fairly bubbled with satisfaction to think that they knew the fairy princess!

Frank read it all with exasperation. It tormented him even to hear her name, to be reminded of her in any way; to realize that she was as much alive as he himself and not the phantom he would have preferred to keep her in his memory. Yet he was inconsistent enough to rage when a letter came that brought no news of her. He would tear it into pieces and throw it out of his cabin window. The fools, why couldn't they tell him what he wanted to know! He would carry his ill humor into the engine-room and revenge himself on fate and the loss of the woman he loved by a harsh criticism of his subordinates. A defective pump or a troublesome valve would set his temper flaming; and then, overcome at his own injustice, he would go to the other extreme, and roundly blaming himself would tell some sullen artificer that it was all a joke. His men, among themselves, called him a wild, cracked devil, and it was the tattle of the ship that he drank hard in secret. They knew something was wrong with him and fastened on the likeliest cause. Others said out boldly that the chief engineer was going crazy.

One morning as they were running up the Sound, homeward bound, they passed a large steam yacht at anchor. Frank was on deck at the time and he joined with the rest in the little chorus of admiration that went up at the sight of her.

"THAT'S THE MINNEHAHA," SAID THE SECOND MATE

Digitized by Google

"That's the Minnehaha," said the second mate. "She belongs to that beautiful heiress, Miss Fenacre!"

"Ready for a Mediterranean cruise," said the purser, who had been reading one of the newspapers the pilot had brought aboard.

Frank heard these two remarks in silence. The sun, to him, seemed to stop shining. The morning that had been so bright and pleasant all at once overcame him with disgust. The might-have-been took him by the throat. He descended into the engine-room to hide his dejected face in the heated, oily atmosphere below; and seating himself on a tool-chest he watched with hardly seeing eyes the ponderous movement of his machinery. It was the anodyne for his troubles, to feel the vibration of the engines and hear the rumble and hiss of the jacketed cylinders. It always comforted him; he found a strange companionship in the mighty thing he controlled; he looked at the trembling needle in the gauge and instinctively noted the pressure as he thought of that trim, smart vessel at anchor and of his dear one on the eve of parting. He wondered whether they would ever pass again, he and she, in all the years to come.

The thought of the yacht haunted him all that day. He took a sudden revulsion against the grinding routine of his own life. It came over him like a new discovery that he was tired of South America, tired of his ship, tired of everything. He contrasted his own voyages in and out, from the same place to the same place, up and down, up and down, as regular as the swing of a pendulum, with that gay wanderer of the raking masts who was free to roam the world. It came over him with insistence that he should like to roam the world also, and see strange places and old marble palaces with steps descending into blue sea water, and islands with precipices and beaches and palm trees.

Almost awed at his own presumption he sat down and wrote to Miss Fenacre.

It was a short note, formally addressed, begging her for a position in the engine-room staff. He knew, he said, that the quota was probably made up and that he could not hope for an important place. But if she would take him as a first-class artificer he would be more than grateful, and ventured on the little pleasantry that even if he had to be squeezed in as a supernumerary he was confident he could save her his pay and keep a good many times over.

He got an answer a couple of days later, addressed from a fashionable New York hotel and granting him an interview. She called him "dear Frank," and signed herself "ever yours," and said that of course she would give him anything he wanted only that she would prefer to talk it over first.

He put on his best clothes and went to see her, being shown into a large suite on the second floor where he had to wait an hour in a lofty ante-room with no other company but a statue of Pocahontas. He was oppressed by the gorgeousness of the surroundings — by the frowning pictures, the gilt furniture, the onyx-topped tables, the vases, the mirrors, the ornate clocks. Here indeed was that other world in which he was no better than a coarse intruder. He was in a fever of expectation and could not fight down his growing timidity. He had not seen Florence for a year, and his heart would have been as much in his mouth had the meeting been set in the old brick house at Standhurst. At least, he said so to himself, not caring to confess that he was daunted by the magnificence of her apartments.

At length the door opened and she came in. She stood for a moment with her hand on the knob and looked at him; then she came over to him with a little rush and took his outstretched hand. He had forgotten how beautiful she was, or probably he had never really known, as he had not beheld her before in one of those wonderful French creations that cost each one a fortune. He stumbled over his words of greeting and his hand trembled as it held hers.

"Oh, Frank," she said, noticing his agitation. "Are you still silly enough to care?"

"I am afraid I do, Florence," he said, blushing like a boy at her question. "What's the good of asking me that?"

"You are looking handsome, Frank," she ran on. "I am proud of you. You have the nicest hair of any man I know!"

"I daren't say how stunning you look, Florence."

"Frank," she said slowly, fixing her lustrous eyes on his face, "you usen't to be so grave. . . . I don't think you have smiled much lately. . . . You are changed."

He bore her scrutiny in silence.

"Poor boy," she exclaimed, impulsively taking his hand. "I am the most heartless creature in the whole world. Do you know, Frank, though I look so nice and girlish, I am really a brute; and when I die I am sure to go to Hell."

"I hope not," he said, smiling.

"Oh, but I know," she cried. "All I ever do is to make people miserable."

"Perhaps it's the people's fault for — for loving you, Florence," he said.

"It's awfully exciting to see you again," she went on. "You came within an ace of being my husband. I might have belonged to you and counted your washing. It's queer, isn't it? Thrilling!"

"Why do you bring all that up, Florence?" he said. "It's done. It's over. I — I would rather not speak of it."

"But it was such an awfully near thing, Frank," she persisted. "I had made up my mind to take you, you know. I had even looked over my poor little clothes and had drawn a hundred dollars out of the savings bank!"

"You don't take much account of a hundred dollars now," he returned, trying to smile.

"I know you don't want to talk about it," she said, "but I do. I love to play with emotions. I suppose it's a habit like any other," she continued, "and it grows on one like opium or morphine. That's why I'll go to Hell, Frank. I wasn't that way at all when you used to know me. I think I must have been nice then and really worth loving!"

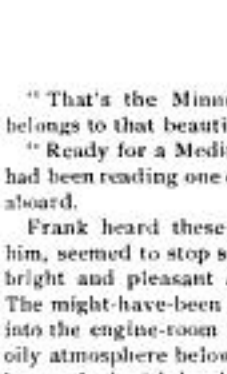
"Oh, yes," he returned miserably. "Oh, yes."

"I have a whole series of the most complicated emotions about you," she said, "only a lot of them are latent like firecrackers before they are touched off. If I lost all my money I'd be in a panic till you came and took me; but as long as I have it I don't think of you more than once a week. Yet, do you know, Frank, if you got a sweetheart I believe I'd scratch her eyes out. It's rather fine of me to tell you all that," she went on with a smile, "for I'm giving you the key of the combination and you might take advantage of it!"

"Florence," he said, "I thought at first you were just laughing at me, but I see that you are right. You are heartless. You oughtn't to talk like that."

She looked a shade put out.

"Well, Frank, it's the truth, anyway," she said, "and in the old days we were always such sticklers for the truth — for sincerity, you know — weren't we?"



"I have no business to correct you," he said. "I resigned all my pretensions that morning in the old house."

A PAPER ABOUT THE MEN WHO MAKE THE POLITICIANS SQUIRM AND THE MILLIONS LAUGH

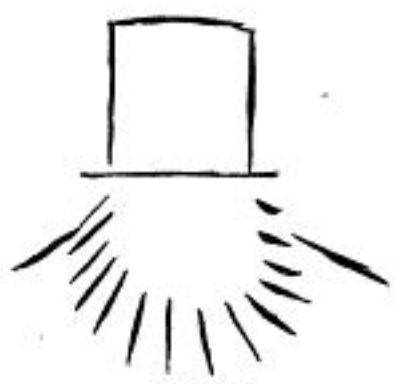
WHEN a newspaper cartoonist meets an interested stranger, the latter at once proceeds to ask the following questions in the order indicated: "How do you go about it to draw a cartoon?" "Where do you get your ideas?" "How do you manage to think up something new every day, month in and month out?" and lastly, "How did you happen to take to cartoon work instead of to regular art work?" The face of the interviewer beams brightly as he adds, "I admire your cartoons very much, but, of course, I don't know enough about art to tell a good picture from a bad one. I couldn't draw a cow myself if I tried a hundred years."

I hope to explain some of the methods of the average cartoonist in the course of this paper, and thus answer the first three questions. The answer to the last, of course, differs in each individual instance. There is one cartoonist I know of who attended a college which boasted an incipient art course and a great deal of higher mathematics. After struggling along several months with grades of seventy-one and seventy-two in algebra, he discovered to his intense delight that if he switched over to the art course he could escape several formidable branches of higher mathematics. So he changed with amazing celerity and thus laid the foundation of a future career in art. If there had been less mathematics in the agricultural course than there were in the art course, he might now be a prosperous farmer instead of a cartoonist. Other cartoonists have, of course, approached their careers in caricature by very different routes. One man, since distinguished as a newspaper cartoonist, was a fireman on a railroad before he sought the drawing-board, and the explanation he gives for the change is that he got tired of working. These two instances illustrate that cartoonists have no common starting-point.

The work of a cartoonist differs essentially from that of other workers in art, in that he must have several qualifications besides the ability to draw. First, he should be able to draw well enough to express his ideas; secondly, he should have a sense of humor; thirdly, he should have a fairly clear idea of what is happening in the world of politics, society and finance; fourthly, he should know something of the Bible, of history, of mythology, and, fifthly, he should have the ability to grasp the importance of a news item when he sees it, so that he may draw from it a logical idea that may be expressed clearly in a drawing. These various requirements are lost sight of by most beginners, who seem to feel that the ability to draw a man with a turned-up nose constitutes the chief requisite of a cartoonist. Many beginners in art aspire to be cartoonists because it looks so easy. They do not reckon with the other qualifications. They know that they can draw, and usually think that they have a keen sense of humor because fond relatives have informed them that certain of their drawings were "perfectly killing"; but it generally develops that they lack the other essentials. A case parallel with the profession of a cartoonist would be a man who could turn a somersault on a bare-backed horse, play a cornet, write heavy editorials and blow glass. It is obvious that such a combination of talents is not commonly found, although many men may have one or two, or even three, of those accomplishments.

The mere ability to draw has about as much to do with making a successful cartoonist as the choice of stationery has to do with making a strong editorial. A very wretchedly drawn cartoon may express an idea so cleverly that the cartoon is immensely successful. In cartooning, the excellence of the idea excuses all shortcomings in technique; and it happens often that an artist may make his cartoons so artistic that the humor and the idea are wholly submerged in the artistic quality of the drawing. There are many instances that prove that good drawing is not essential to a humorous picture. Eugene Field, who had a slight idea of drawing, could make pictures that were overflowing with fun and drollery; and even Mark Twain, who cannot draw at all, can make crude pen-scratches that are extremely amusing simply because he ignores all the rules of real drawing. If a cartoonist is a clever draftsman, very well; but he should realize that his work is to be judged by the idea and not by artistic standards.



His drawing should have in it the spirit of caricature and his idea should be expressed simply and directly. Every part of the picture should strengthen the central idea and nothing should be added that would detract from it. When any one looks at the cartoon he should not think that here is a fine drawing, but that here is a cartoon pure and simple. If the cartoonist can do these things he is almost ready to begin drawing for the paper.

Let us assume that it is morning and the cartoonist must have a cartoon ready for the following day's paper. His first work is to evolve an idea, and in doing this he is influenced by several cardinal principles of journalism, paramount of which is the necessity of keeping a weather-eye on the counting-room of the paper. Which is to say, he must weigh carefully whether his cartoon will offend an advertiser or lose a subscriber. No humor that is likely to cut down the subscription list is humorous to the publisher of the paper. Therefore the artist must avoid subjects that are likely to reflect unpleasantly upon any race of people that happens to be largely represented in the circulation lists or advertising columns. He is at liberty to lampoon Americans all he wishes, because Americans are a rather uncertain mass that lacks cohesion, but he must not hit the Irish, the Germans, the Jews, or the Swedes, all of whom may be found in the subscription list of the average American daily and all of whom are quick to resent any slur against their nationalities. In my own experience I have found the Germans particularly sensitive to any reflections on the Kaiser or on their fatherland. This may be due to the fact that since the Spanish-American war the people of this country have not shown any particular confidence in German intentions, and the papers have reflected the feeling so generally that prominent German-Americans have undertaken a propaganda to influence our newspapers against German-baiting. The cartoonist is not required to be so considerate in his treatment of the French, the English, the Chinese or the Turks, for the reason that these races are not so numerously represented in the circulation books. It is a golden rule that when somebody must be lampooned, let that somebody be a distant foreigner who doesn't take the paper.

KRUGER

The cartoonist also learns that he must not make a cartoon that runs counter to the religious principles of any church denomination, and that, for reasons of propriety, it is well to avoid any reference to the Deity and sacred Bible characters, as well as anything suggestive or vulgar, or anything horrifying in the way of human suffering. It is usually considered in bad taste to employ some great calamity, such as the Mont Pelée disaster, as a theme for a humorous cartoon, even though the cartoon may be intended to express an idea entirely foreign to the disaster itself. Another fixed rule is that the cartoonist shall not picture wives or children of national celebrities who may be before the public—and, in fact, never to draw a woman in any way unless it be distinctly complimentary.

Concerning Cartoons of the President

THERE has been some discussion as to how far a cartoonist might go in cartooning the President of the United States. It may be remembered that President McKinley's death was followed by a fierce denunciation of some of the cartoons that previously had been printed about him, and that this outcry resulted in a radical change in the tone of cartoons dealing with the Chief Executive. For a time there was a disposition to show President Roosevelt in most heroic and dignified pose—frock-coated and with the light of lofty inspiration in his eye. Greater latitude now exists, for there seems to be no good reason why cartoonists should not cartoon the President, provided there be nothing demeaning or disrespectful in the pictures. I have been told that the President's wife was so much amused and interested by the cartoons that were printed of him when he was running for Vice-President that she had them collected and arranged in scrapbooks; perhaps that is why the White House has been so greatly enlarged within the past year. The cartoonist should recognize the honor and dignity of the office without going to the ridiculous extreme of considering its occupant a sacred being whom it would be lèse majesté to caricature.

"How do you get your ideas?" and "How do you think up something new every day?"

Suppose it is morning and there is not an idea anywhere in the world. The first move a cartoonist makes is to read the morning papers carefully, taking note of the news that is uppermost in the public mind. If conditions are such that everybody is interested in a certain piece of news, then the cartoonist endeavors to build a cartoon that treats of that subject. Nearly every day brings forth one big piece of news that commands more attention than anything else before the public. One day it may be a great election; the next day it may be a war scare; the next day a notable speech; the next day a widely-advertised prize-fight, and so on through an endless variety of changes.

From the one dominating piece of news the cartoonist endeavors to derive his idea. Sometimes it happens that there are other ideas suggested by news of slightly lesser interest and so he carefully makes a note of them. By the time he has digested the papers he may have a half-dozen or more suggestions equally good—or poor, as the case may be. One may be an idea that deals with a topic of broad national interest, another may appeal to that class of readers that is deeply interested in politics or legislation, still another may have the domestic interest that will appeal to women and children. It always is desirable to make a cartoon that will appeal directly to the greatest number, but, of course, this is not always practicable. In my own experience I have found that women are not particularly interested in political cartoons and do not understand them unless they treat of some great event in a Presidential campaign. If there happens to be something intrinsically interesting or amusing in the drawing they will remember the cartoon, otherwise they will shed it as a duck does water. In the same way a domestic or social cartoon may not appeal to the large, rough man who sees nothing in the world except politics and other heavy topics. Cartoons that deal with subjects very close to home life have been found to be the most generally interesting, although it is not possible to draw these all the time.

With his list of cartoon suggestions the cartoonist goes to the editor and submits them for his editorial approval, or else if he has discretionary powers he selects himself the one that offers the greatest possibilities for a successful cartoon.

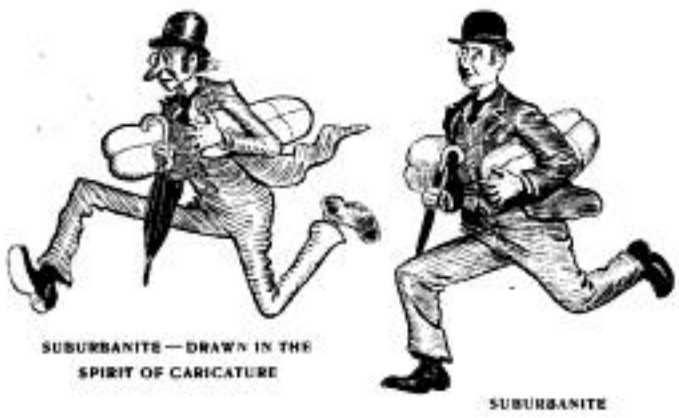
To illustrate the sort of ideas he submits, I will mention a few that were suggested one day last spring. The piece of news that was "featured" on the first page was Senator Hoar's speech in the Senate, a remarkable oration in which the keynote was an appeal that the Philippines be given the same treatment by the United States that was being given to Cuba. This news was the germ of an idea that would represent Senator Hoar, with face beaming with grandmotherly benevolence, pointing to a perforated cardboard motto which he had just worked out in the style of the old-fashioned "God Bless Our Home" mottoes. It was "The Filipinos' Golden Rule," and it said, "Do unto Us as You Have Done unto Cuba." Another big piece of news that was strongly featured that day was the report that a negro had been burned at the stake some place down in Texas. Using this as a text, a suggestion was submitted that showed a Filipino congratulating himself that the "water-cure" had been introduced in his country instead of the "fire-cure." This suggestion was speedily discarded as being repugnant, for the reason that it was an effort to give a humorous turn to a condition that should not be handled humorously, if at all, in a cartoon.

CLEVELAND

The third idea was founded on the approach of commencement time, and this was selected because it had the quality of being good-natured, innocuous, and also timely. The class of ideas to which this belongs might be considered as a sort of pictorial breakfast-food and is popular with the cartoonist, who feels that his mission has been fulfilled if he succeeds in bringing a bit of cheerfulness to some one's heart and thereby makes the beginning of a day sunnier. Its excuse lies in the belief that people prefer to be amused than to be reformed. The cartoons of this class never rock the foundations of nations, but they probably make the world a little more cheery as it rolls along.

The Eleventh-Hour Hunt for Ideas

IN HANDLING this commencement idea the cartoonist showed the two methods employed by a young man and a young woman in preparing for the great, eventful day. The young man was shown deep in the throes of writing his oration, the subject of which was "What Congress Should Do." He was barricaded behind immense volumes of references and presumably was settling for all time to come the affairs of state. The young woman was preparing in a different way. She was in a dressmaker's establishment and was being measured for her graduating frock, the inference being that to all fair graduates the matter of personal appearance on that eventful day was of vastly greater importance than showing Congress how to run the ship of state. It is safe to say that the prairies were not set on fire by this cartoon, but it had the merit of hurting no one's feelings and of being a better aid to digestion than a cartoon depicting a negro being burned alive.



The foregoing examples of cartoon ideas were founded on the news that appeared in the morning papers of that day. The following day may have suggested half a dozen more, all but one of which had to be consigned forever to the waste-basket; for it is true that the average length of life of a cartoon idea is one day. It must be used while it is fresh and timely, for the next day the world may turn absorbingly to some subject that is newer and more interesting.

It sometimes happens that there is not an idea suggested by the news and it may be late in the afternoon before one is evolved. A nervous cartoonist might become anxious as the hours passed unfruitfully, but there is always the cheering consolation that the cartoon will be drawn because it simply has to be, and in the recollection that oftentimes the eleventh-hour idea is one of the best.

When the eleventh hour comes, however, and brings no idea, the cartoonist is obliged to "dig." He looks at the date of the following day and asks himself if it has any significance. Is it the anniversary of any notable historical event; is it the birthday of any of our country's great, either dead or living; or is it of any particular interest as to the weather, the length or shortness of the day, or of anything relating to fashions in dress? What is happening in Washington? What is the President doing? If he is doing nothing, then that in itself is noteworthy and might form the nucleus of a cartoon. All these things are canvassed for and aft, up and down, inside and outside, until finally the glimmer of a suggestion beams through the clouds. Every holiday suggests something. Every anniversary of a historical event or of a hero's birthday suggests something; every change of weather or fashion suggests something; every month suggests something; there is always some speaker or professor who says something extraordinary, so that it is not remarkable that some sort of an idea is gradually squeezed out by the cartoonist whose mind is trained to observe, deduct and construct.

If the subject that is selected admits of humorous treatment, the cartoonist handles it in that vein; if it does not, he handles it in a serious way. Broadly speaking, all cartoonists might be classified in two groups—the humorous and the serious. There are some subjects that should not be treated frivolously, and there are some evils that demand more stinging rebukes than can be given with ridicule or good-natured satire. A club in certain trying moments is more productive of unwholesome results than a reprimand.

There is perhaps more to be avoided in drawing serious cartoons than there is in drawing humorous ones. A steady diet of the serious style is likely to become monotonous, for no one likes to be scolded or be preached to or see other people scolded continually, even though he knows that the scolding is needed. And the American people, most of all people, like considerable good nature mixed with their lectures. Some serious cartoons are savage and venomous and doubtless do far more harm than good, for they cannot but create a feeling of sympathy for the persons whom they attack. They have an unpleasant effect upon the one who looks at them and in doing so react against the attacking party. The cartoon that is charged with malice or venom might just as well be left undrawn, so far as any beneficial effect on the public goes. Another type of the serious cartoon is the one that appeals to class prejudices and strives to arouse the passions of one element of society against another. This class of cartoons is distinctly unwholesome. Take, for instance, the cartoon policy of representing capital as a devouring monster whose only purpose in life is to throttle the poor workingman. Such cartoons have no effect upon people who think, but in the minds of the ignorant they nourish a spirit of hostility to capital that is undesirable.

The Good-Natured School of Cartoons

THE other school of cartooning is the one which strives to attain its end in a good-natured way, eliminating the sting as much as possible. It is not so powerful or direct as the serious school, but a great deal of good results from its influence. It is insidious and sinks deep without one's suspecting. The cartoons of this school "hit off" the existing evils and abuses with good-natured ridicule or satire, and like the sugar-coated pill, are pleasant while you are taking them.

Up to this point I have written chiefly of the creation of the idea and not of the manual labor of putting the cartoon on paper. When the cartoonist has his idea selected he "lays it out" roughly in tabloid form on a small piece of paper, so that when he begins the cartoon he knows exactly where he is going to place every figure and how he is going to illustrate his central idea. This being done, he carefully draws it out in a much larger form on cardboard, usually two or three times the size it will be when it appears in print. Then, with black ink he makes his drawing, cutting out everything that will not strengthen the idea. If the idea is a good one, there is lots of fun in drawing it, particularly if it is along the humorous line. Anatomical accuracy in drawing the figures is abandoned and everything reduced to simple forms. A correctly drawn figure is very seldom amusing; and also a figure that is too grotesquely drawn is often likely to be offensive. If the cartoonist desires to express surprise, incredulity, anger, joy, or any of the many changes of the human face, he does it boldly and without any attempt to be anatomically correct. He uses as little shading as possible, for the more he uses in a face, the further he gets away from making a funny picture. Any emotion can be shown in eight lines so convincingly that there can be no doubt as to what is intended. The slightest turn of one or more of these lines will change gladness to misery. A few lines will suggest President Roosevelt so that no one could mistake the intention, even though the picture does not look like him. An old-fashioned plug hat and some straggly whiskers suggest Mr. Kruger, just as a military mustache and a helmet suggest Kaiser Wilhelm. Instead of being portraits they are merely symbols that mean certain people—symbols which newspaper readers become familiar with and which never fail to suggest the people they stand for. The portrait of a man drawn carefully and true to life would look stiff and formal and would be completely lacking in humor and spontaneity. Brevity in drawing is the soul of humor in a cartoon.

THE CARTOON TYPE REPRESENTING "CAPITAL" OR "TRUSTS"

THE CONVENTIONAL UNCLE SAM

THE UNCLE SAM THAT WOULD BE MORE TYPICAL

Just as certain symbols mean famous men, so other symbols stand for imaginary people. For instance, a fat man generously besprinkled with diamonds, gorgeously adorned with side-whiskers and a silk hat, is the symbol used to express "capital" or "trust." He is always corpulent, which is assumed to be indicative of wealth, especially when the corpulence is garnished with a few large diamonds. The latter are usually shown busily shooting out streams of radiance. It is not known why bankers and capitalists and rich men are represented as wearing side-whiskers, but it is probable that the early American pioneer cartoonist used the elder Vanderbilt to typify great wealth. It may be remembered that these first very rich Americans wore side-whiskers and that one, at least, expressed some disregard for the rights and feelings of the public in general. Later cartoonists stick to the type because the average reader has been trained to associate side-whiskers with great wealth.

An anxious-looking man loaded down with bundles stands for a suburbanite; a man with a checked suit, a fierce overhanging black mustache, a huge diamond and a gaudy hat tipped down over the eyes, stands for a gambler or a confidence man. By adding a horseshoe watch-charm the same man is changed to a race-track sport. Congressmen are symbolized by chin whiskers and slouch hats, although in real life you see few such men. Old maids always wear spectacles and ringlets; family men usually are wheeling a baby-carriage; club-women are shown with high foreheads, contracted brows and ample avoirdupois. Uncle Sam is always the tall, gaunt gentleman with an old-fashioned beaver hat, a wisp of beard trimmed à la capricorn, and trousers a few inches too short. Just why the United States should be so represented nowadays is past finding out, unless

AN INVENTORY OF WHAT MRS. EVERYBODY-KNOWS-WHO WEARS AT THE OPERA. WHERE SHE DOES HER BUYING

By David Graham Phillips

NOT since the days of the Cæsars and the Coliseum—if then—has there been such an exhibition of wealth enthroned in barbaric splendor as was to be seen at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York City, on any one of half a dozen very fashionable nights early in the past season. And the chief element in wealth's pomp, pride and circumstance was one which an ordinary citizen might have minimized—the jewels. True, whichever way one looked there were the flash of diamonds, the clear, steady ray of the ruby, the glistening glow from the pearl. But only those who know about jewels realized how amazing was the spectacle in respect of that one single concentrated expression of enormous prosperity. For example, one ruby in the collar about the neck of that woman in the box to the right cost $25,000—and she could easily have put herself in pawn, just as she was dressed, for three or four hundred thousand. That young woman to the left—plain? Yes, but that slender string of pearls cost $150,000. And on a score, two score, of heads were tiaras and crowns each worth from twenty-five thousand to forty thousand. As for rings and the like, you could have filled a bushel measure several times with trifles worth from one thousand to four or five thousand each. Here is a jeweler's inventory of one woman—she by no means the most begemmed and bejeweled:

Crown,	$ 40,000
Earrings (pearl),	10,000
Collar,	25,000
Necklace,	125,000
Breastplate,	20,000
Stomacher,	15,000
Shoulder clasps,	2,000
Gown embroidered with pearls,	20,000
Rings,	30,000
Fan with jeweled sticks,	5,000
Jeweled slipper buckles, garters and corset clasps,	3,000
Total,	$295,000

So preposterous was the display of jewels that the women who had had a great deal of jewelry for a long time—the mentioned woman was one of them—were presently pronouncing jewelry bad form and were wearing none, or only a few fine pieces—a simple pearl necklace ($100,000 or more), or a handsome but not showy collar worth a few tens of thousands, and some rings, of course. But the fact that "so many common people are loading themselves down" did not move any one to dispose of her jewels, and at the private fashionable entertainments Mrs. So-and-So still came full panoplied in her half a million dollars' worth, and Mrs. Everybody-Knows-Who still hid her bones beneath a flashing breastplate that shot forth a myriad tongues of wonderful flame each time she drew or expelled a breath. The truth is, now as in the earliest recorded times, the passion for jewelry is all but universal, and rages whenever there is an era of prosperity. And the jewel is the everywhere present sign of real or alleged wealth, Fifth Avenue and Bowery, theatre, street, restaurant, public or private entertainment, morning until morning again. New York jewelers are the largest buyers in the markets of the world—and they sell to the entire country. For, if New York is buying ropes and crowns, the rest of the country is buying rings and sprays.

Editor's Note—This is the first of two papers by Mr. Phillips. The second will appear in the next issue.

Digitized by Google

In our simple days, before the Civil War, we imported a modest million or so a year in jewelry. Now we import twenty-five millions a year—and this makes no account of the millions brought in by smuggling, or the half a hundred millions manufactured here. Once—not so very long ago—we were not too curious about flaws and shades in gems. Now, we have our jewelers scour Europe and Asia for peculiar shapes and shades, and, when they return with what we wished, we say: "Very good. Go forth again and bring me the match for this wonder—no matter about the cost." Once, a very rich man or woman, about to invest a few thousands in gems, would debate the matter week after week before taking the conclusive step. Now, the fashionable jewelers themselves marvel not a little at the offhand way in which tens of thousands are invested in jewels in the course of a careless poking through trays of gems. A man went into a jeweler's in Newport on his way to the boat and said: "Anything new?" The jeweler produced two diamonds worth twenty or twenty-five thousand. "I didn't intend to buy anything to-day," said the man, "but I like these and I'll have to make several presents this season. I'll take them." And he drew his check, thrust the gems, in their tissue-paper wrapping, into his waistcoat pocket and hurried on to catch his boat. This is a very small instance—a commonplace, almost. Any New York jeweler could tell you a dozen such stories more remarkable.

But the buying of immense quantities of gems is not confined to America. Throughout civilization the rise of machinery and democracy has produced results similar to those in this country—a prosperous people, capped by a plutocracy eager to deck itself with all the recognized insignia of the triumphant class. And of these insignia the jewel gives the most ostentation with the least danger of what the less recently "arrived" would deride as bad taste. A plutocrat may err in his pictures, in his equipages, in his liveries, in his house and its furnishing; but diamonds and rubies, pearls and emeralds—there he cannot err, if he have an honest jeweler. The jewel-buying plutocracy, European and American, has raised the prices of gems without in the least—apparently—lessening the demand for them among people who profess to abhor ostentation.

The curious—the suspicious—fact is that the supply somehow just keeps pace with the demand, or rather, lags behind it barely enough to maintain the stiff prices which prosperity will bear.

Why Diamonds Never Become "Common"

IN THE case of diamonds, the mystery is really no mystery at all. The best diamonds come from South Africa, and the mines there are all in a "combine," called the De Beers Consolidated Mines. No one, except the few of the "inside ring," knows how great is the annual production of diamonds. But all the world knows that, just before the "combine" was effected by the Rhodes-Barnato crowd, there was a prospect of diamonds becoming as common as amethysts—and as cheap. This would have meant a complete collapse of the demand for diamonds. Of course, we know that the reason the fine lady longs for diamonds is not at all because of their great cost—perish the vulgar thought!—but solely because of their great beauty. But the South African diamond crowd, being vulgarians, went upon the vulgar assumption that if diamonds were cheap nobody would want them. The output was restricted and the De Beers continues to pay forty per cent. dividends and to put by a reserve from which it could pay thirty per cent. more; and the diamond has not become a semi-precious stone.

This explains how it happens that the supply of diamonds manages to keep just a forty per cent. dividend pace behind demand. But how explain the similar phenomena in the supply of rubies, pearls, sapphires and the rest of the precious stones? If the jewelers know, they do not tell.

Our jewelers go oftenest to Paris and stay longest there. Into that market flow most of the market-seeking gems of the world, nearly all of them, except the diamonds, coming from the "gorgeous East." And though in these times of plethoric prosperity they have to pay higher prices than they did a few years ago, still they always get what they seek. Can it be that the gorgeous East is also the crafty East, and has, without making a fuss about it, its "combines" that rule ruby and sapphire mines and pearl fisheries?

It is not a long schooling to become an expert in jewels. One does not need brains, or much knowledge, or any great amount of taste. The two requisites are both natural gifts—excellent eyesight and a perfect sense of color. Any "expert" can tell a diamond from an imitation as far as he can distinctly see it. Rubies and emeralds must be examined—rather carefully. As for a pearl, it can be recognized as true or false as soon as the expert has it in his hands. But when it comes to the finer work, the great expert is he who can discriminate in color to the last shading of a shade.

The Opportunity for Sharp Dealing

JUST because the testing of jewels is such a simple matter, there is no other business in which there is so much deception and fraud upon the consumer. Given a difficult matter and men ignorant of it are not ashamed to confess their ignorance and to call in help. But given a simple matter and every man will pretend to know, will think he knows, will refuse to learn or to be taught. Thus, then, while dealers in jewels are never deceived, buyers of jewels—well, if you feel that you must buy jewels, go to a first-class dealer and pay the irritating extra price he will charge as a guarantee against fraud. The officially reported value of the jewels imported into this country is no index to the prices got from their purchasers. The first-class places add to the highest price the market will bear a commission for their own honesty; the places that are not first-class add in an even larger commission as a punishment to the customer for being ignorant and foolish. As for the installment places, their prices are the highest plus interest compounded upon compound. To know how much a man or woman paid for any gem or bit of jewelry you must know where it was bought and must guess what humor the dealer was in on the selling day.

Of all the precious stones the most expensive is the ruby—yet there is no ruby weighing over five carats that has not a flaw. And there are no emeralds of any size without flaws. But a flaw in a diamond is fatal—not to its sale at a high price to an ignorant customer, but to its beauty in the eyes of a connoisseur. That is the reason why so many of the very large diamonds in the world are not especially admired by the discriminating, and are regarded as curiosities rather than as fine gems. Their size is wonderful, but so is the size of some of the tasteless fruits that come to us from tropical and semi-tropical countries. The best opals are found in Australia, though some fairly good ones are New Mexican. Montana produces sapphires, but the Orient is the place from which all the best ones come. For example, a chain of American sapphires that costs $275 would, if made of Oriental sapphires of the same size, cost about $1700. The difference, like the differences among rubies and emeralds and the rest, is in coloring. And any one can see the reason for the difference in price as soon as he sees the two kinds side by side.

One American jewelry house cuts its own diamonds. But the great diamond-cutting and other gem-cutting centres are Amsterdam and Paris, and we can never hope to compete because we have no such low-priced skilled labor. Some cutting is done in Oriental countries, but it is all crude. The Oriental cuts his gems for distant effects, for public functions. Gems that have been cut there are always recut before an attempt is made to sell them in Occidental markets. And the huge Oriental pieces made up of cunningly arranged semi-precious stones are always broken up before shipment to the Occident. It has no use for jewel-corselets, elephants' breastplates, and the like.

When our jewel-buyers go to Paris they find in small and usually rather mean offices the wholesalers with safes full of cut gems each done up separately in a bit of tissue paper. And in a strong light, with a magnifying glass and a pair of delicate scales as the only instruments of trade, the purchases are made. Prices? It is impossible to say. Diamonds are worth $115 or thereabouts a carat just now. But this is the price of a diamond of three or four or five carats. If it weighs eight or ten the price is much greater. And this is true of all precious stones. Pearls sell for just about double the prices of twenty years ago, and they are easily damaged by water and sometimes from no known cause get "sick" and have to be skinned to restore them to healthy lustre.

The Craze for Graduated Stones

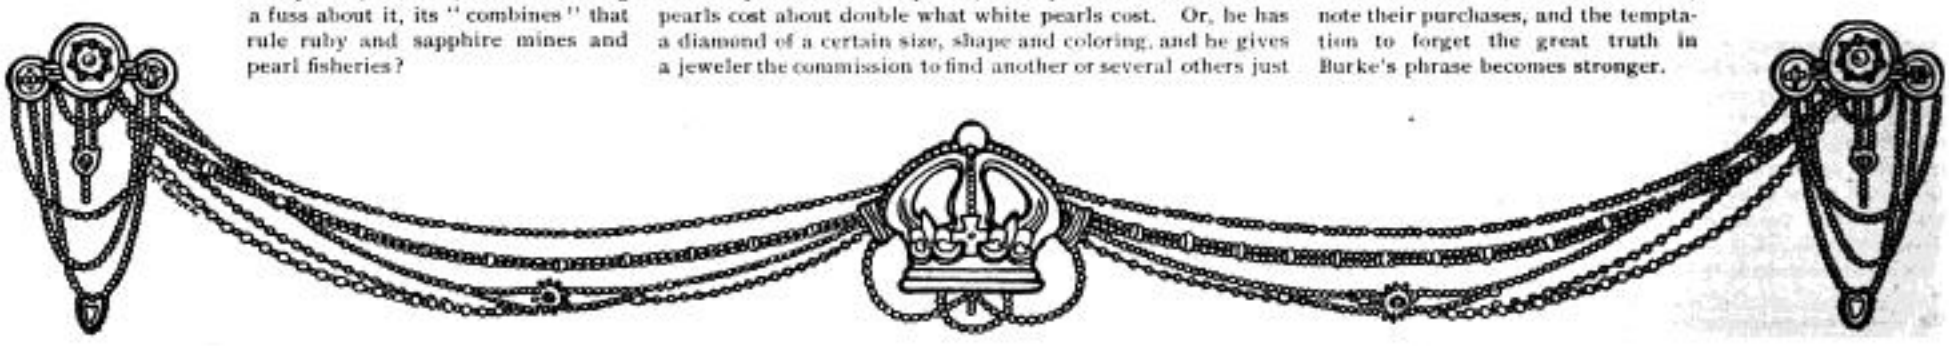
THEN there is another element—matching. A rich man wants a string of matched or graduated pearls. This means long waiting, patient search, extravagant prices. If his fancy is for black pearls, in any circumstances black pearls cost about double what white pearls cost. Or, he has a diamond of a certain size, shape and coloring, and he gives a jeweler the commission to find another or several others just like it. The wholesaler profits by this, if he has the luck or the shrewdness to learn the value of his gem; and the middleman does not work for nothing. A diamond that by itself might bring no more than ten or twelve thousand, will bring half again or double as much if it is needed in matching.

The most interesting part of the gem business is this filling of special orders—and the most lucrative. For Americans have, in recent years, taken up these matching and graduating fads. The largest jewelry houses in New York have at least one man constantly in Europe, searching for stones or pearls that will just fit in with other stones or pearls. There are two New York multi-millionaires that have recently placed with a certain jeweler large and highly difficult orders of this kind on which they have put no price limit whatever.

Stones for stomachers and the like are not usually selected with especial care. But stones for necklaces and tiaras, crowns and collars, must each be very beautiful, and must meet all sorts of requirements as to size, shape and color. And this means expense—it explains $40,000 and $50,000 tiaras and crowns; it accounts for $150,000 or more in a rope of pearls.

Then, too, there is the fad for collecting precious stones not for wear but for exhibition in cabinets or just to put away in a safe and look at once in a while when the owner feels like cheering himself up a bit. And there is the fad of the less rich for collections of semi-precious stones—topaz, amethyst, fresh-water pearl, moonstone, crystal, turquoise, the strange green peridot from Egypt. All of these fads, whims, extravagances, passions for ostentation mean "fancy" prices for jewels of every kind, mean much hurrying to and fro among wholesalers, much energy expended upon results that would to many people seem small indeed. But perhaps we ought to be more often pitiful than critical toward the invented occupations of the bored or the satiated.

Jewels as an Investment



THERE is a theory that jewels are a "good investment." It is true that some jewels—rubies, for example—have risen in value. It is true, also, that better than throwing a hundred or a thousand dollars into the gutter is buying jewels with it and putting by the jewels against a rainy day. But the difference between the wholesale and the retail price of jewels is so huge that, with rare exceptions, the possessor of an ordinary jewel or collection of jewels has that for which he could get back only a small part of his money. And this would be true of most collections of jewels that are out of the ordinary. The only reason for making such collections is the pleasure of the collector in the gratification of his whim through his own and his agent's efforts. Further, the duty on jewels is sixty per cent. just now.

When duty and retailer's profit and wholesaler's profit and producer's profit and the commissions and "rake-offs" of sundry and divers middlemen are subtracted from the selling price of the jewel, when allowance is made for the gullibility or prodigal indifference of purchaser, what value is left? Often not much. In a diamond, very little. More in a pearl; most of all, perhaps, in a ruby. To attempt to reduce this problem to figures would be to indulge in mere guesswork. The dealer in articles of pure luxury—in wines, in cigars, in jewels—finds his customer in the gambler's mood and takes advantage of it. You pay for your purchase; also you pay for your—folly, shall we call it?—in purchasing.

But nothing is more significant of the mood into which the civilized world has been brought by modern commerce with its sudden enormous returns, its amazing easing of the conditions of life, than the vast expansion of the jewelry trade. Go into any city of civilization and you find these great retail shops, windows and cases and safes filled with gems. Come finally to New York and you find for retailing more of them than in Paris. This means that many of us think they have money to throw away and are throwing it away.

Edmund Burke once said in a moment of, even for him, lofty inspiration: "The public is always poor." To look at the number of New York's retail jewelry-dealers and at their stocks, one would be tempted to believe that Burke's saying did not apply to the American public, but that America, rich as a nation and rich as to certain small classes, was also rich as to the class called the masses.

Watch the streams of customers, note their purchases, and the temptation to forget the great truth in Burke's phrase becomes stronger.

The Lighter Side

Labors and Laughters of Presidential Boom Building

By Alfred Henry Lewis

WHEN Congress came together in December, 1891, there came with it divers Presidential booms. In every studio of politics, sculptors of party were carving away at the features of this or that candidacy, and all hopeful of the prize.

Hill, dark, bilious, pike-hungry for the White House, brought with him when he entered the Senate from New York his own personal hopes and fears for a nomination. Hill was as ambitious as Louis XI, without the Frenchman's insidious genius for chicane. He got into blundering, prompt trouble with the folk about him. For one thing, he lacked modesty and was prone to push forward in debate. These traits of vainglory were resented by ancient Senators who stuck by tradition and held that your Senate newcomer should listen with deference, make no retorts, and observe a novitiate of dumbness—sit as tongue-tied as an oyster.

These transgressions of Hill on solemn Senate customs were so flagrant as to evoke a lecture from Harris, of Tennessee. The latter was a statesman who made a specialty of fury; his visage was one of your queer, fantastic portraits which one beholds on tea-chests or mayhap carved on the far-ends of fiddles. In a red-faced way of hectoring, Harris undertook to put the ebullient Hill in his proper place. Harris with as much prospect of success might have sought to put a rattlesnake in its proper place. Hill interrupted him before he won to a first semicolon.

"Don't attempt your plantation manners with me!" warned Hill, high of vein and insolent of brow.

Harris almost expired at this; his face congested, his neck swelled, and it was as though the fingers of an apoplexy were feeling about his heart. However, he recovered sufficiently to look Hill over with cold, superior eye, and allude to him as "A mephitic bubble on some chance-hallowed mudhole of affairs."

Hill's Cut and Thrust Debating

HILL had much of the knife-fighter in his make-up. Lack of tact Hill might be charged with; want of courage, never. He would war with any or all who came to the lists. Norse throughout, for all his black hair and swarthy skin, Hill has the racial instinct to go close in upon his foe, and the racial expectation to come back covered with blood. There was, when Hill stood in the Senate, nothing delicate or of a long-distance character in his notions of strife. Had it been the olden day and the Senate an arena, with Hill a gladiator, he would have fought with ax and short-sword; he believed in the coarse, effective work of hack and stab.

One might note this knife-taste while Hill was making a speech. He had but the one gesture; his right hand forward and on a level with his breast would foin and fence as though it held a bowie. It was a gesture of thrust and parry—the plain fence of the bowie knife.

When Hill made a point, he thrust straight forward like the stroke of an adder. It was as though he pierced the heart of an adversary.

Hill, with his eagerness to seize a White House—albeit none about him believed he would succeed—and his smiting system of giving battle to any who crossed his way, was a figure of interest to his fellow-Senators. Sterett, of the newspapers, asked Coke, in the Senate from Texas, what he thought of Hill.

Coke, though narrow and a bit provincial, was a judge of trouble and of trouble-makers. His own biography in the Congressional directory described him as having been removed from the Supreme Bench of Texas by General Sheridan, "as an impediment to reconstruction," and one glance at Coke would show how this must have been so. He had the very appearance of an impediment.

When Sterett asked concerning Hill, Coke put on an air of thoughtfulness.

"Bill," said Coke, and then proceeding with his funny lisp—"thith man Hill ith a thtronger man than we thought. And Bill, he ith a natural dethperado. If he'd been born and brought up in Texath, he'd a-killed twenty men by now."

Gorman, smug, smooth, a prince of intrigue, also had his Presidential aspirations. And yet it was Gorman who advised Hill to come to the Senate. Hill thought Gorman would support him for the Chicago nomination. Gorman, however, merely used Hill to steal New York from Cleveland; Hill was Gorman's stalking-horse over whom he would shoot, for himself, his White House game.

Gorman knew that Cleveland was the great, natural candidate; it was Cleveland he must defeat. The Maryland Machiavelli, as an element in his nomination-hunting, resolved to seize the House control. It was Gorman who produced Crisp for the Speakership, while Mills, of Texas, was the name about which the Cleveland forces clustered. They said "Mills is the logic of the situation," but they meant Cleveland. In the caucus struggle between Crisp and Mills for the Speakership, everything American was supposed to be at hazard. A tariff policy; silver versus gold; Gorman against Cleveland for a Presidency.

The Battle of the Frocks

ONCE upon a time a cow kicked over a candle and burned the city of Chicago. Victory or defeat for that Speakership was made finally to swing on a hinge almost as slight. Mrs. Tarsney, wife of Representative Tarsney, of Missouri, was a lady of taste in dress. Also, she had a pride of her frocks which was instantly set on exasperated edge when Mrs. Mills—also a lady of taste—told the other Congressional wives at Willard's that Mrs. Tarsney's frock didn't fit. Mrs. Mills conceded that Mrs. Tarsney's dress fitted in front, but she averred it to be too full in the back, and was willing to leave the question in its settlement to the public at large. Indeed, in her fairness, Mrs. Mills did call as much public attention to Mrs. Tarsney's dress as was possible, and on the subject of its "fit" invoked the general judgment.

Now, Mrs. Tarsney was a power with her husband. As a retort to Mrs. Mills she became a Crisp worker, and while the Missouri delegation was, properly speaking, a Mills delegation, she made a Crisp man of Representative Tarsney. Also, she brought into the Crisp fold Representative Wilson, who emanated from that Missouri district nearest neighbor to her husband's. Crisp was elected over Mills at the tail of a fight which staggered on through one hundred ballots, by a majority of two. It was Mrs. Tarsney and Mrs. Tarsney's dress. On such slight hooks do these our destinies depend.

Among Democratic Presidential candidates of a decade and two years ago were Cleveland, Gorman and Hill; and though the lapse of time has eliminated from the lists a Morrison, a Palmer and a Gray, and substituted therefor a Parker, a Carter Harrison and a Francis, soothsayers and wise folk declare that again the great trio of twelve years ago, Cleveland, Gorman and Hill, will each come seeking next year's nomination. This last may make an added reason why the long-ago deeds of these ambitious gentry should wear a present interest.

When Congress met in 1891 it was difficult to forestall the issue for the coming White House campaign. Some there were who said it would be silver; in the earlier moments of Congress it would have that look, and to quote from a forensic effort of the late Thomas B. Reed, "the Congressional woods were full of gold bugs, silver bugs and straddle bugs."

Reed himself among Republicans was a well-developed candidate against Harrison, and on that same question of silver sent forward his friend and ally, Lodge, of Massachusetts, to draw the popular fire and locate party as well as public sentiment on the quarrel then raging between white and yellow finance. Lodge could take the risk, since he was installed in Senate safety for the next six years to come; nor was he himself reaching for any higher limb.

Lodge, to test the risk for Reed, offered a pro-silver resolution of ambiguous, cloudy sort. Then Reed leaned back to note what would happen to the daring Lodge. It was as though some gentleman, meditating a similar trip, should first send a dog over Niagara Falls in a barrel. The result, however, bore no silver comfort, and Reed, and everybody else for that matter, were at once sedulous to withhold themselves from that subject of perilous money.

The Melancholy Launching of the Gorman Boom

GORMAN, as a candidate for the Presidency, would be coy and distant and non-committal. The nomination must pursue him, make love to him, take him as it were by storm. This modesty did not suit with the vigorous moods of Brice and Vest and sundry of the Gorman propaganda. They declared that he must come forth, and that his name should be openly used. The present Gorman system left him all the safety while they ran all the risk. He must take the peril of his own ambitions; and so they strictly told him.

It was settled that Gorman's candidacy should be shoved from shore at a dinner. Gorman would give a feast in honor of an orator of the Middle West; Crisp would be there; the Gorman men of the Senate—and that among Democrats meant everybody save Vilas and Hill—would be there; the guest of honor would make a speech. Carried away on the burning currents of his rhetoric, he would demand the candidacy of Gorman; Vest and Vorhees and others eloquent and present would take up the cry; Gorman would be overpowered. He would be modest; he would hesitate; but also he would be compliant and submit to numbers and to force. From that dinner should date the open candidacy of Gorman.

The evening and the guests arrived—all save the guest of honor. Fifteen minutes, thirty minutes, an hour went by to join that wide eternity of the past, and still no guest of honor. There were murmurs; a hungry Senator is a vicious thing, a thirsty one a danger.

The Man in the Closed Landau

GORMAN gave way to a situation; waiting no longer for the delinquent guest, he commanded the oysters and the sherry to appear. Coldly, almost in silence, did the sulky feast proceed. However, the absent guest was on his way. The repast had gotten to terrapin when a dark, sinister-seeming landau, tightly closed, drove to the Gorman gate. No one stepping forth, a committee was named to search the landau's depths. The search bore fruit, and yet a cheerless fruit. Within the deeper recesses of the vehicle the committee found outstretched that guest of honor; but steeped in such profound abstraction was he that he heeded neither the committee's nor his duty's call. The guest of honor was dragged forth and filed away on a sofa; there he abode while in the next room the disappointed dinner went forward in Arctic sort. There were no speeches; no eloquence swept all before it, and no Gorman boom was sprung. The situation at the finish was the situation at the start.

If Gorman had owned a broad streak of the cavalryman in his constitution he might have done something Presidential for his hopes. But he is a soul of cabinets and alcoves, rather than the camp—a plotter not a fighter. He has no stomach for that last grim charge which, when intrigue and chicane have carried as far as they will, is ever required to secure success. Gorman was a candidate until twenty-four hours before the Convention was called. Then he disappeared—literally and physically disappeared. When next met with he was at Whitney's cheerful elbow doing what he might for Cleveland; and that stubborn Princeton publicist was made the nominee on a first convention ballot, Hill sticking to the last—a catboat contending with a liner.

On that last Chicago day of 1892, just prior to the Convention, those whose shout was "Anything to beat Cleveland!" went from delegation to delegation and made a count of noses. To their amazement they discovered that Morrison, of Illinois—not a mentioned candidate—was, next to Cleveland, the strongest name. Morrison had been a Forty-niner, and California and the West were for him in a spirit of romance. Morrison had fought through the Mexican War, and Texas and a slice of the South were for him on sentimental grounds. It looked as though, with his own State of Illinois at his shoulder, Morrison's name could be flung into the Convention and prevent Cleveland from calling about him those two-thirds demanded for a triumph.

The Woman Who Made a President

ILLINOIS had instructed its delegation for Palmer. That "instruction," however, was but a rope of sand. Foreman, Fithian and others wired Morrison in Washington saying they could take the State from Palmer, and asking permission to use his name. Eckles, who was later to be Comptroller of Currency, also wired Morrison and urged him to withhold his name and to give his weight for Cleveland. Morrison was not in Washington; Mrs. Morrison opened the messages. Wise, shrewd, faithful to a point of honor, Mrs. Morrison sent word in the name of Morrison to Eckles urging the delegation to stay by Palmer while he had a chance, and when it left him—if such a time should come—to give its vote for Cleveland. Eckles published this dispatch; and with that publication was swept away the one great danger which stood in the path of Cleveland. If it were a woman's word that gave Gorman the Speakership against Cleveland, it was also a woman's word that bridged to the latter's feet that last convention chasm which yawned so widely in the very finish of it between victory and himself.

Gorman's desertion of his own candidacy, to employ a colloquialism of the woods, left many an excellent gentleman out on a limb—notably Crisp, whose second Speakership would be much at Cleveland's mercy when tenant of the White House. There be folk who deem Cleveland as one hungry for revenge. He did not prove it at this crisis; for all Crisp's Gorman partizanship, Cleveland was quick to have him returned as Speaker. Also he called Morton to his Cabinet; and yet Morton with broadest denunciations of both Cleveland and the party had left Chicago before the Convention was brought together, saying he would neither see nor assist at that nomination.

Speaking of Crisp, folk in Washington will wait long for one more lovable or more high to come among them. One might tell his greatness from his frank nobility of heart; from his want of affectation, his lack of snobbery, his iron confidence—when courage and confidence were asked for—in his powers and his position.

Crisp was a natural captain; he assumed command of men as though it were his birthright. Withal, he was as much without an art as without an arrogance.

"THAT WOULD BE BULLY, WOULDN'T IT?" SAID THE BOY

The Thousand-Dollar Skates

FOR the benefit of those who may have missed (or deliberately avoided) reading the first and second story in this series a word or two of explanation is necessary. Know then that a company of good fellows were returning in a special car from a dinner that they had attended in Syracuse. They were the guests of that well-known advertising man, Tom Chandler, and they had whiled away the time both going and coming with stories of personal adventure for the most part, and there was no man in the party who was allowed to escape story-telling, although it did not fall to every man to possess the charm of speech or manner of the actor or the cartoonist. With the latter it was not so much what he said as the delightful way he said it, whereas in the case of some of the others it was more the intrinsic interest of the story told than the manner of the telling that made it memorable. The animal painter, the dry-goods man, Tom Chandler himself; in fact each man in the party of twelve had told a story, and it now fell to the clergyman to tell his second. His first had been an anecdote of a best man who stole the wedding fee intrusted to him by the groom.

"Doctor Stringer, it's up to you again," said Tom when the laughter following one of his own jokes had subsided. Chandler was just as slangy when addressing the clergyman as he would have been in talking to a man in his own line of endeavor, but for the matter of that Doctor Stringer himself dropped into slang when occasion offered, feeling that a bit of slang was often merely an immigrant to the shores of language and that it might be a matter of but few years when it would hold perhaps an aldermanic position in the body verbal.

Mr. Stringer waved his hands deprecatingly. "I'm a better listener than talker," said he.

"Now you know that's an exaggeration," said Tom, "for I've stood on the outskirts of a Sunday and you did all the talking. Tell us a church story. It will surely be good."

"Well, then, I'll tell you about little Arthur Boswell and the raising of our church debt. It is a story that I should have labeled 'fiction' if I had read it in a newspaper, but to me its chief interest lies in its being absolutely true down to the last word. I have merely taken the usual prerogative of changing names in order to avoid action for libel in case this ever gets into print."

Here he looked at the special correspondent, who actually winked at him.

"When I became rector of St. Cephas (which was my first charge, by the way) I didn't know that the little church overlooking the Hudson was saddled with a mortgage of fifteen hundred dollars or I shouldn't have accepted the call: I dislike debt as much as some people dislike cats. But as soon as I learned of its existence I determined to wipe it out if such a thing were possible.

"I will pass over my efforts with my vestry, as they amounted to nothing. If there is anything more ineffectual than the average vestry meeting I have yet to learn of it."

"All business meetings are the same," said the actor, who belonged to the Order of Elks and was a member of his local fire department. "Shakespeare had business meetings in mind when he spoke of 'Words, words, words.'"

The clergyman laughed approvingly and continued: "After my non-success with my vestry I attended a meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary and, knowing that they had the good of the church at heart, I asked them if they did not think it would be a good thing to wipe out the debt, and" (the clergyman laughed softly at the recollection) "one little woman said she thought it would, and that she would embroider initials on handkerchiefs that could afterward be sold for fifty cents apiece at a church fair, and that she would willingly do six of them to help along the cause. And another very sporty woman whose husband kept a hotel in the village suggested that we have a turkey raffle at her husband's.

"Of course I sat down promptly on that, for when I became a minister I put aside raffles and all games of chance and many other things that I had indulged in when a boy on the Erie Canal.

"Well, the women did show a good deal of interest in the matter and were much more businesslike than their husbands, but, after all, it was a young lad who had come into the room (in direct disobedience to his mother) to ask where his skates were who eventually extinguished the debt.

"'Mamma,' said he, looking at me out of the corner of his eyes and picking at the buttons on her waist, 'Mamma.'

"Of course 'Mommer' told him to run along, and equally, of course, he stood stock still, being a boy of average disobedience, and said, 'Mamma, I know a way to pay the debt. Sell something to a man for a certain price and then make him sell it to some one else for twice as much, and so on until it's sold for what the debt was.'

"This not very lucid exposition was not well received by his mother, who felt that he was disturbing the meeting (although I am sure that she was the only one annoyed). But I called the boy over to me—he was a manly, sturdy, erect little chap of about twelve or thirteen—and I asked him how he came to think of such a thing.

"'Why,' said he in quick, nervous tones, 'I read the other day about a boy who found a mouse and traded it for a sick cat that he cured, and then swapped her for a lame dog that got over it, and swapped the dog for a pony with the distemper, and the pony got well and he swapped her for a horse, and at last sold the horse for several hundred dollars, and the mouse hadn't cost him a thing. Now if you could get richer and richer or generouser and generouser men,' said he, 'to buy a pair of skates or most anything, and they knew they were helping the church, then we'd get a lot, and at last you could go to some of these rich men that they make fun of in the papers—I mean men that feel wicked at having so much money and who want to get right—you know—why maybe we could get one of those men to buy the skates for a large sum and that would pay the debt, and maybe there'd be money over so's we could build a bigger church than ever. That would be bully, wouldn't it?' said the boy.

"'Perfectly bully, my son,' said I; 'and I will appoint a committee consisting of you and some of your chums to sell those skates over and over again.'

"Of course, every one thought I was joking excepting Master Arthur. And then tea and cakes were served and Arthur was sent out of the room by his overnervous mother after he had secured a handful of cakes and trod one into the rug, and every one supposed that the proposal was one of my jokes. For I regret to say that at the outset of my ministry I was inclined to be jocose and it was several years before I lived down my reputation."

"All the same, that was a bright idea of the kid's," said Tom Chandler, whose business mind at once scented possibilities in it.

"It was," said Doctor Stringer, "and Arthur was one of the brightest boys I ever knew. He was a great newspaper reader and really knew more of what was going on in the world than many a man of three times his age. I dare say that more than one of you have read some of his Monday morning surveys of the money market in one of the New York dailies, for Arthur is now a financial reporter at the early age of twenty-two. A brilliant boy.

"However, I don't want to get ahead of my story. At first I had thought to have Arthur and two or three of his chums go around together with a pair of skates that I donated to the cause, but I soon realized that a man was needed to inspire confidence; and so I asked the clerk of the vestry, a Mr. Turner, as meek as Moses, but a perfect watchdog for integrity, and he and Arthur had a good many amusing experiences, although they were more amusing to Arthur than they were to Mr. Turner, who was totally lacking in a sense of humor. I don't want to make this story too long or I should tell you about his various receptions as he went from parishioner to parishioner. There were several very rich men in my parish but it was not the richest who gave the most, and Arthur sometimes had to try several houses before he could get the subscription next in order. Some would not double the amount but did give sums like twenty or fifty dollars, and that worried the boy a good deal, as he had hoped to double it right along. He had a piece of paper with the problem all worked out. He was aiming at $1500, the amount of the debt.

"He told me that he went first to the stingiest man he knew, who happened to be a parishioner, and he explained his plan while Mr. Turner stood by and nodded his head solemnly—so the boy told me—and then Arthur offered to sell him the skates for ten cents—for in these doubling propositions you have to begin with a small amount or you'll get into millions in no time. The stingy man bought the skates on sight, and then Arthur said it looked as if the whole thing was spoiled because Mr. Stingy wanted to keep the skates for his son, who, it seems, had been clamoring for a pair for over a month—in fact ever since cold weather had set in—and the old man thought that if he could get a pair of standard make for ten cents he would be foolish to let them go; but Arthur pierced his cuticle in some way known to boyhood and came away with the dime and the skates. The first day of his quest he visited six men in moderate circumstances and got money amounting to $6.30."

"Slow work," said the cartoonist, who was in the habit of receiving fifty dollars for a cartoon and whose mind worked in big numbers.

"Yes, the first day was slow, but the second day Arthur and Mr. Turner visited some ten of the richer members of my flock, but only five put their names down for the regular subscription, which was thereby advanced to something like $200. I've told this story before and I recall the figures. Ah, Mr. Chandler's figuring it out."

Tom Chandler had been absent-mindedly calculating what the tenth progression would be, and he now announced it as $102.40, or $204.80 for the total.

The clergyman did not seem to like the interruption and drummed with his fingers on the frost-covered pane.

"Some of those who refused to double the amount already given promised to contribute something to bring it to the required sum; some denounced the whole proceeding as savoring of bunco, but most of them were pleased at Arthur's straightforward manner and rather enjoyed the fun of buying skates that were doubling in value every few hours.

"But the next day Arthur found it a thankless task. The amount was now in the vicinity of $100, and, although there were half a dozen millionaires who had villas on the Hudson and who attended my church, Arthur found but one who was willing to give—How much is it?" said Doctor Stringer with just a suspicion of irritation.

"Two hundred and four dollars and eighty cents," said Tom, totally unconscious that he was worrying the good rector.

"That's it. When Arthur came to me that evening he was very non-committal as to his future plans. He said he could count on an even $500 but he would not tell me where he expected to get the thousand, having totally exhausted our domestic millionaires. My whole congregation did not amount to over one hundred communicants, which meant that there were not over twenty heads of families.

"The rest of my story will have to be read to you, as it is in the form of a letter. I thought I might be called upon for a story so I provided myself with material."

Doctor Stringer laughed genially (Tom Chandler had stopped figuring) and took from the inside pocket of his frock coat a letter written in a boyish hand on some ten hotel letter-heads.

"I did not hear from Arthur for a day or two and in the last mail one Saturday night I received this letter from him bearing a New York date of the same day and fully explaining why he had not been to see me. Next morning I saw him in church and he told me the story again, but his written account is better than my memory of his verbal one, although that was very picturesque.

"'Dear Mr. Stringer, I thought I would not say anything to you about what I meant to do until it was done because I was afraid that I might fail. But I didn't and Mr. Turner is going to take me to the theatre to-night so I won't see you till to-morrow which is the reason for my writing. And anyhow I am glad of the chance because Miss True said that we might write a letter instead of a composition to hand in next Wednesday and that it might be about something that really happened and this really did. I'm glad it did for I can't make up.'"

Here Doctor Stringer looked up from the letter to say, "I'm not going to mention the name of the millionaire who figures in this letter otherwise than as Mr. Blank, for I understand that he does not court newspaper publicity."

"HE SAID I'D DOUBLE HIM UP IF HE THOUGHT MUCH ABOUT ME"

"'Mr. Stringer I went down to the office of Mr. Blank with Mr. Turner because I knew he had crowds of money and they say he is generous with it and I thought that $1000 wouldn't be any more to him than a cent would be to me and you. Mr. Turner says to write smaller or I'll use up too much hotel paper. We had lunch here and I am writing in the office at a nice little desk wish I had one like it.' (Arthur's punctuation is not impeccable, but he's only misspelled two or three words in the whole letter.) 'I went down to the office of Mr. Blank and I told a man at a gate that was inside of the office that I wanted to see him and he laughed at me and that made me mad and I said that it was a matter that affected the whole future of St. Cepha's I thought big words would be good and I guess he didn't understand what I meant for he looked kind of astonished, so then I called Mr. Turner and he came up and said what I'd said only kind of bashful. Say, I'll bet Mr. Turner hasn't been in New York much for he acted kind of scared and afterwards I asked him if it was Mr. Blank's money that made him scared. My, I wouldn't be scared of a man just because he had money. So then a door in the back opened and a big man came out in a hurry and talked very loud and I kind of guessed he was Mr. Blank the way the clerk acted so I said out loud to him "Mr. Blank I want to see you as soon as it's convenient.'

"'Mr. Turner says he expected that we'd both be turned out of the place because he says that Mr. Blank has a quick temper but I'll bet he likes boys for as soon as he heard me he looked around at everybody in sight and kind of chuckled deep down in his throat and then he said "I can see you now sir."

"'Imagine, he said Sir to me but I think he was only joking. Well Mr. Turner was coming in too but he hasn't much nerve and I told him to stay out. Sometimes when a man shows he's frightened it makes teasers pitch on to him same as a dog will and I think Mr. Blank is a teaser. So I went in alone and Mr. Blank he said as kind as could be "What do you want?" and I said "Mr. Blank I want to sell you a pair of skates for $1000 for St. Cephas Church" and he just brought his two fists down on his desk with a bang and he threw his head back and just bellered like a bull. And when he had stopped bellering and I saw he was only laughing his way I began to open the box to show him that the skates were all right and that I had them with me. And he wanted to know if I had been long at that sort of business because he didn't know but there might be something in it for him and then I saw he wasn't any one to be afraid of any more than if he hadn't a cent so I told him all about the debt and how people had doubled the money until now we had $500 and all we needed was just $1000 and then he bellered some more and he made a joke then. He said I'd double him up if he thought much about me and then he asked me if I was American born and I told him I was and glad of it—and I am, you bet—I told him I wouldn't be an Englishman for a good deal because I'd got to them in my history and he told me that when I was older I'd like them better and that Bunker Hill was a long time ago and that the English were sorry for it and then I thought that talk about history wouldn't raise any money so I said "Well, will you buy the skates? You're the last one on the list and you may keep them."

"'And then he bellered again and said that if he did buy the skates he'd put them in a glass case. And then he asked me a lot of questions about what I learned and what I played and what I wanted to be when I grew up—and say, Mr. Stringer he says that if I decide to go into business and not be a soldier that he'll give me a place in his office and then he told me that he was an Episcopalian himself and that surprised me because I didn't suppose those very rich men had any religion and he didn't seem to be giving me the money because he was afraid at all but just because he felt like it. I liked him, Mr. Stringer, because he seemed real and because I'll bet he was a regulyer of a boy when he was young. I told him all about the time we went camping last summer at the lake and while I was telling him a clerk brought in a lot of cards to him but he just put them on his desk without looking at them and asked me a lot of questions that showed he was interested in boats and Mr. Turner said I had no business to take up his time that way but he kept asking me questions and he said—honest, Mr. Stringer, he said that next summer if I reminded him of it he'd take me to sail on his steam yacht' (y-o-c-h-t). 'And then he took up his check book and he made out a check for a thousand dollars and gave it to me and I gave him a receipt and then he bellered again although I don't see why he did that time and then he walked all the way to the front door with me and shook hands with me and the fellers at the desks stared good and hard and so did Mr. Turner and I told Mr. Blank that it was Mr. Turner and he shook hands with him but not the same way he did with me. Anyhow Mr. Turner seemed afraid to shake hands and I think the reason is that he wasn't ever a real boy. He can't swim! But he was awful glad to see the check and he felt so good that he's going to take me to the theatre this evening. No more now as I will see you to-morrow but I don't see why they didn't stop that debt years ago as long as it was so easy to do. Yours very truly,

"'ARTHUR BOSWELL.'"

"Well, you may imagine that I read the letter with delight, and when Mr. Turner came around to my rooms at midnight and handed me the check with the signature of the great man on it I felt like doing something substantial for Arthur."

"What became of the boy?" "Who was the millionaire?" were the questions put to the rector at this point.

"Arthur finished his course at the High School and graduated without honors, as he never was much of a student, but I had no fears for his future, and the millionaire was as good as his word and took him into his employ."

"Who was the millionaire; was it Rockefeller?" asked a man who ought to have known better.

"I guess it was Pierpont Morgan," said Robert Green, the hero of The West Point Start.

"I'm not at liberty to say which of you is right if either is, but as I said a while ago the millionaire saw something in Arthur and to this day he is the friend and adviser of the boy. I met him not long since at a Chamber of Commerce dinner and recalled the story to him, and he told me that he never [illegible] a thousand dollars for anything with more pleasure than when he bought those skates. And then, as Arthur would have said, 'he bellered.'"

JULIAN CRANE

CHAPTER VII

CONGRESS adjourned on the fifteenth of June, just two months after it was convened in extra session. Thorndyke's apprehensions had been confirmed. Few legislative follies had been committed—the House had gone with the people, leaving to the Senate and the Administration the disagreeable task of stemming the popular tide as far as possible when it rushed on too fast. No reputations had been damaged in either House, and several had been made—but none to equal Julian Crane's. As for Thorndyke, the newspapers seemed to have forgotten his existence.

By the time adjournment was reached Washington was deserted. The class which is designated as "everybody" was either going or gone. The outgoing steamers carried half the town across the ocean. Thorndyke had promised himself a treat—a trip to Europe that year—the first since that long remembered one which had settled his fate in some particulars for him. But one word from Constance, on the afternoon when he went to bid her farewell, changed all this in the twinkling of an eye.

He found that she had just returned from a near-by place in Virginia, where her family had been established many generations before the Louisiana purchase had sent them toward the Gulf of Mexico. Constance was full of her Virginia trip, and told Thorndyke that she meant to take for the summer the old family place—Malvern Court—at the foot of the Blue Ridge Mountains, where many generations of dead and gone Maitlands had lived and flourished, after their migration from their first American home on the shores of the Chesapeake. "And I hope," she continued smiling, "that you will have the opportunity to meet some of my Virginia cousins. I shall have a great many house parties during the summer, and you are among those I shall invite. I hope you may accept."

"I accept now," replied Thorndyke—and, in a breath, his trip to Europe melted away and was as if it had never been. Then Thorndyke very artfully found out the hour of her departure, which was to be three days later.

When Constance on a warm June morning arrived at the station with her five negro servants and her household and personal paraphernalia, to start for her summer in Virginia, she found Thorndyke waiting for her. In the station he had met Annette Crane, who had just seen a constituent off. At the same moment they caught sight of Constance.

"Come," said Thorndyke, "go with me and say good-by to Miss Maitland. She is a real friend of yours, and I know she will be glad to see you before she goes."

They came upon Constance, very smartly dressed, as always, and looking young and animated. She was superintending the tickets and luggage of herself and her five servants. Thorndyke, on reaching her side, proffered his assistance, but his offer was promptly repulsed.

"How on earth would you manage five negroes?" she asked. "You would lose your patience in five minutes—you don't know what they know or what they don't know. I think I have everything straight now. I will keep the tickets myself." And then, escorted by Thorndyke, she saw her five charges and the horses, the traps and the trunks in their proper cars, and sending Thorndyke after Annette Crane, herself took her place in the drawing-room car for her three hours' trip.

When Annette stepped in the car to spend ten minutes with her Constance was sincerely glad. She felt a strong and strange sympathy with Annette Crane. Never were women more dissimilar in type, in environment, in ideas than those two women—but both were gentlewomen of sense and right feeling, and on that common ground they met and became friends.

Constance expressed a wish that Mrs. Crane might be in Washington the next winter, and Annette quietly replied that she expected to be.

Then Constance continued that she should be so glad if she and Mr. Crane would pay her a visit during the summer. Annette's eyes sparkled—it was a distinct triumph for her—because she knew, and knew that Crane knew, that he never would have been asked but for her. She thanked Constance warmly, but said she was afraid it was impossible—she never went away from Circleville in summer, and Constance, seeing longing in Thorndyke's eye, repeated her invitation to him, and made his middle-aged heart beat fast by doing it—and then it was time to go, and the train pulled out.

GOVERNOR SANDERS

CHAPTER VIII

CRANE with Annette and the two children had returned to Circleville after the adjournment of Congress, and immediately on reaching home he had been beset with a temptation, against which he made a short, hard fight, and then was conquered, and gave up all the honesty of his soul as regards politics. One week after his return to Circleville he had received overtures for peace from Governor Sanders, and a meeting between them had been arranged.

It took place in a neighboring city, in the private parlor of a hotel. The two men were entirely alone. Sanders, a bulldog of a man, came out frankly and told Crane that by the cutthroat policy they were pursuing they were simply playing into Senator Bicknell's hands, and depriving the State of its just weight with the National Committee, in the year of a Presidential convention. His proposition was a large one but was put in a few words. The Governor began by freely admitting that Crane had got the best of him in the matter of that Senatorial appointment—the politicians were agreed on that. But all men make blunders, and Governor Sanders proposed to atone for the blunder he had made about the Senatorship by joining forces with Crane instead of opposing him further. It was plain that there was a strong revolt against Senator Bicknell, and a split was inevitable among the chiefs as soon as the legislature met which would elect a Senator. When this break came new alignments must be made, and Governor Sanders believed and said that if he and Crane should join forces they could oust Senator Bicknell and get control of the machine.

At the mention of Senator Bicknell's name Crane changed countenance and mumbled something about his political obligations to the Senator. Sanders met this by saying that it was his opinion that if Senator Bicknell were not ousted there would be grave danger that the party would lose the State at the next election, and, in any event, there must be a new alignment of forces, and he was simply proposing to take advantage of the inevitable. He then went on to explain briefly his plan. The protocols must provide that Governor Sanders should throw all his strength toward getting Crane the party nomination for the full Senatorial term in January. In return, Crane was to devote all his energies to securing the Governor's election two years hence to succeed Senator Bicknell. Meanwhile, Senator Bicknell was nursing a very robust and promising Vice-Presidential boom which must of course be strangled in the cradle. Nothing must be heard of it at the next Presidential convention a year hence; but four years hence, when both Crane and Sanders would be in the Senate, it would be time enough to decide which one would strive for it. The geographical position of the State, and the uncertainty of the elections for many years past, would put them in a very good strategic position, either to capture the Vice-Presidential nomination or to dictate it to the convention; and that was a prize which could be held in reserve.

The success of the whole, however, depended upon keeping Senator Bicknell in the dark, for although he had not displayed the qualities of a truly great boss, like Senator Standiford, yet he was a man of considerable force, well liked, a gentleman, and a favorite in his party. If he suspected the plotting of an insurrection against him, he might, in two years' time, overthrow it completely; but he was an unsuspicious man—a weakness in a boss—and could be easily deluded into believing that no effort was necessary on his part to hold his own. For that reason the warfare between Sanders and Crane should ostensibly be kept up. Especially must this be the case in selecting delegates to the National Convention. Senator Bicknell's aspirations for the Vice-Presidential nomination must be frosted on the apparent ground of dissensions among the leaders in the State; but as soon as the election was over they could come together and have four years' amicable struggle to prove whether Sanders or Crane should be seriously put forward for the Vice-Presidential nomination five years hence.

Crane listened to this nefarious scheme with disgust—a disgust in which a great longing was strangely and violently mingled. Every word that Sanders said was true—Crane knew that perfectly well. The machine was going to pieces—there could be no doubt of that—and Crane, with accurate knowledge of conditions, saw that the Governor's plan, although far-reaching, was quite practicable. The whole thing, however, hinged on keeping Senator Bicknell in the dark. In a free, fair fight the Governor and himself might be worsted. Senator Bicknell might be considered the founder of Crane's political fortunes, and had certainly treated him with great kindness, and had procured his advancement—but then, it was a question whether the great law of necessity did not compel Crane to go with Sanders. Senator Bicknell would not, if he could, ruin Crane, but Governor Sanders was fully capable of it, and would, if he could. Indeed, Sanders conveyed as much.

"Of course," he said carelessly as he lighted a cigar, "you would have to be very circumspect in every way from now on. Voters, you know, are easily offended. As a matter of business purely, I shall mention to you that there has been some talk about your leaving your wife at home during your time spent in Washington. I have heard that, except for the short visit she paid you during the extra session, she has not been there since the first session at which you took your seat. Of course, everybody knows that it is all straight between you, but it was a mistake on your part, just the same. It will give your enemies a handle against you."

Crane grew pale. How strange it was that in all those years he had never been conscious of the supreme folly of his behavior! It had not once occurred to him, until that evening in Washington, hardly more than a month ago!

"Mrs. Crane remained by choice in Circleville on account of the children," replied Crane, "and because my salary as a Congressman doesn't admit of my having my family there as I should wish—particularly as I had some debts to pay, and my house in Circleville has a mortgage on it."

"Oh, I understand perfectly, Mr. Crane. All of us who know you do. I was not speaking of the view of your friends, but of your enemies on the subject. However, if money is the consideration, I think I could guarantee you your Senatorial term in good style—nothing extravagant.

you know, but enough to put your mind at ease. Your notes, with my indorsement, would be accepted at any bank in the State, and the matter could be kept quiet."

It was the old story—making chains out of his necessities. And they were very great. Crane spoke of paying his debts. He had scarcely made any reduction in the principal, and had only succeeded in paying the interest, which, with his living expenses, of which his own were twice as much as Annette's and the children's, and his small life insurance, had galloped away with his five thousand a year. And if he should lose the nomination—there was not much danger of that now, but everything was possible with a machine and a man like Governor Sanders.

Crane's better nature, however, rebelled against the deceit to be practiced on Senator Bicknell. That, he declared, he could never bring himself to—and believed it at the moment.

"Then," said Governor Sanders, rising, "we may conclude our conference. The entire success of the campaign I have mapped out depends upon Senator Bicknell not being taken into our confidence. We have not proposed anything against the party; we are simply proposing to do for ourselves what Senator Bicknell has done for himself, and if things go on as they have been going on under his direction, I think we stand an excellent chance of losing the State at the Presidential election."

Before Crane's ardent mind loomed a vision—six years in Washington as a Senator—and he was not yet forty-three years old—living in good style—and then, the chance—not a bad one, by any means—of the Vice-Presidential nomination in a little over four years. It was a glorious vista. Like the Arabian glass seller, his imagination far outstripped itself. He saw himself, at forty-eight, Vice-President—at fifty-two, another term—at fifty-six, still in the Senate, with a great reputation. Even the Presidency did not seem beyond him. He had the enormous advantage of youth over most of his rivals. A Vice-President stands one chance in three and a half of succeeding to the Presidency. Altogether, it was a dazzling dream, so dazzling that Crane began to feel the old regret and longing that Fate had not given him a wife like Constance Maitland. He was afraid, even in thought, to wish that it might be Constance Maitland. How that woman would shine in an official position! And then, the other side—but there was no other side. Without Sanders' help he would have a desperate fight before the Legislature, and that outlook which had seemed so rosy when he described it to Constance Maitland in her drawing-room a few months before, grew dismal and gruesome when examined in Parlor Number 20 of the Grand Hotel. If defeated for the Senatorship, and under the ban of Governor Sanders, his seat a year hence would be certainly doubtful, and if the machine ran over him it meant annihilation. So, tempted of the devil, Crane yielded and promised everything the Governor required.

As the Governor had found him an uncertain quantity before there were due precautions taken to keep him in the traces this time by veiled threats of what would befall him if he kicked over them a second time. Crane understood this perfectly well. He also realized that there were two men under his skin—one, honest and loving the truth, and the other, craving money and power and consideration, tormented with vanity, enslaved by self-love, a fierce and hideous object to contemplate. But he need not contemplate it, and with this determination he took a friendly cocktail with the Governor and departed for Circleville. That hint about his wife opened Crane's eyes to the necessity of the outward practice of virtue, and he then determined to compass, as far as in him lay, the whole comprehensive sin of hypocrisy. He would be very attentive to his wife and devoted to his children. He would go to church regularly. He would adopt a Cincinnatus-like mode of life that, out of his small means, he might contribute to charity and have it known by the special correspondents. In short, he proposed to become that object of man's hate and God's wrath, a hypocrite.

Straightway he began this mode of life, and deceived everybody in the world except himself and his wife.

He did not deceive himself. There was enough of honesty in him to make him loathe himself, while doggedly carrying out the devil's programme into which he had entered with Governor Sanders. As he went to church on summer Sundays, with Annette by his side and the two children trotting soberly in front of them, Crane felt as if a bolt from Heaven ought to descend upon him for his treachery to the man who had befriended him. Sitting in the cool, dim church, his head devoutly bowed as if in prayer, he doubted that there was a personal God—for if so, how could He tolerate such blasphemy as a man praying to be seen of men, giving it to be published in the newspapers, and saying to his brother, "How is it with thee, my brother?" and then stabbing him in the back?

At one thing the evil spirit within him shuddered and turned away. This was when he had a very friendly letter from Senator Bicknell, saying he should be in the neighborhood of Circleville within the next fortnight, and should accept Crane's often-urged invitation to stop and spend a day at his house, if convenient.

The idea of receiving under his roof the man he had betrayed was too much for Crane. Enough moral sense remained in him to make him shrink from that. He wrote Senator Bicknell a very friendly and even affectionate letter, explaining that important business would take him away from home for that week, and expressing the deepest regret that he could not have the long-promised visit. And forthwith, on the promised day, Crane made an excuse of business, and went speeding toward the nearest city. He said no word to Annette about his letter from Senator Bicknell, but some suspicion of the actual state of things had crept into her mind. She knew that Crane was under obligations to Senator Bicknell, and a close reading of the newspapers had shown her that Crane and Governor Sanders were supposed to be mortal enemies. Yet, she knew that the Governor and Crane were in the most friendly communication, whereas Crane had ceased to mention Senator Bicknell's name. And some anxiety was weighing upon him, that she saw plainly. She saw that Crane was prosperous, that he was rising in importance every day—and yet, was miserable. He had grown thin and pale in those few weeks since he had entered into his evil compact. It could not be want of money, because Annette had never known him to be so well supplied. She began to suspect some moral lapse on his part, and the thought nearly broke her heart, for Julian Crane was the love of her life, and she loved him in his degradation as profoundly as in the time when she had believed him to be the soul of honor. A singular complication came of Senator Bicknell's letter. He did not get Crane's in reply, and on the day he had proposed to be in Circleville he found himself at the little station. There was no one to meet him, but it was easy enough to find the way to Crane's house; he was the local great man of Circleville.

When he reached the house, with its many verandas, embowered in fine and vigorous elm trees, the front door was wide open, and looking through the low, wide hall he could see the garden beyond. There, under a tall lilac hedge, sat Annette in a rustic chair, sewing. On a rustic table before her the children had their books, and took turns reading aloud to her. As always, she was simply but freshly and becomingly dressed, and as the green light fell on her fair hair and her pensive, pretty face she made a charming picture for any man to contemplate. Senator Bicknell had an æsthetic soul as well as an honest heart, and the pretty scene appealed to him. He walked through the hall into the trim garden, and, hat in hand, introduced himself to Annette.

She rose at once, smiling and blushing, and made him hospitably welcome. She knew nothing of his expected arrival, which convinced Senator Bicknell that there had been some misunderstanding concerning his letter. But the Senator was so pleased with his first impressions that he accepted Annette's invitation to remain and share their one o'clock dinner—an invitation given with palpitations, but so promptly and gracefully accepted that Annette was delighted at her own courage in proposing it. The Senator, seated on a rustic settee, and admiring the aspect of things in the house and garden, as well as the mistress and her children, thought himself in luck. He expressed regret at not seeing Crane, but frankly declared himself very well satisfied with things as they were.

Emboldened by her success in entertaining the Senator, Annette proposed that she should notify the leading citizens, and invite them to call at five o'clock to pay their respects to him. Senator Bicknell good-humoredly assented; it would be of advantage to Crane, he thought—mistakenly enough—and it was worth while obliging a subordinate, if that subordinate had a wife as pleasing as Mrs. Crane.

By the time this was settled it was one o'clock, and the Senator found himself seated at Annette's dainty table, with the two children, waited on by Annette's one servant, a neat, hard-featured creature, who knew how to cook.

The Senator was worth millions, had a French chef and a chronic dyspepsia, but he spoke truly when he told Annette he had not enjoyed a dinner so much in years as the one she gave him. It was very simple, but good and well served. The children never opened their mouths except when spoken to. Annette was surprised, as at Constance Maitland's dinner, to find herself altogether at ease, and was conscious that she was making an agreeable impression every moment of the time. To be appreciated gives the most timid confidence; and it was perfectly evident that this trained man of the world appreciated this woman, as sweet and natural as the wild roses that grew in the roadside hedges. They found much to talk about, and Thorndyke was mentioned—at which Annette overflowed in praises of him, to which Senator Bicknell agreed.

He was much amused by Annette's impromptu plan of having a reception for him that afternoon, and accused her of aspiring to be a second Madame Roland, but laughingly agreed with her when Annette assured him that it would be worth several votes to Crane in the coming Senatorial contest.

After dinner he was shown to a cool and spotless chamber, where he had a very refreshing nap and a bath. At five o'clock he was summoned below. Annette awaited him in the modest drawing-room. She wore a pretty muslin gown, and looked as fresh as a dewdrop. With the assistance of the neighbors the lower floor was dressed with flowers, and simple refreshments were served upon tables in the large and well-kept garden.

Annette, taking her stand at the door of the drawing-room with the Senator, received with dignity and grace the people who came pouring in—the judge of the county court, the professional men in the town, the principal of the Circleville High School—all accompanied by their ladies, wearing their best silk gowns and very tight kid gloves. Senator Bicknell was affability itself. He was an amiable man, and Annette Crane's virtues and charms were such as

The Third Term Bogey

NINE Presidents have been elected for two terms—Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Jackson, Lincoln, Grant, Cleveland and McKinley, all of them except Cleveland for two successive terms. Two of the nine did not live to complete their second terms—Lincoln and McKinley. Of the remaining seven, four have been talked of for a third term—two, Washington and Jefferson, for a third successive term; two, Grant and Cleveland, for a third term after an interval. In the cases of the remaining three—Madison, Monroe and Jackson—there was no talk of a third successive term partly because precedent was against it, chiefly because the men themselves were not eligible in the exciting political conditions, Jackson for other reasons, as well as because he was seventy and very infirm at the end of his second term.

It is generally supposed that Washington refused a third term because he was against it on principle. It is true, at that early day in the history of the Republic, indeed in the history of the democratic-republican form of government, there was a feeling that it was necessary in every formal way to emphasize the difference between the elective or votative principle and the hereditary principle. But Washington was not influenced by this feeling. In that immortal Farewell Address he apologizes for not accepting a third term, assures his countrymen that he is "influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest, no deficiency of grateful respect for past kindness." In the case of Jefferson, the declination of a third successive term was through dread of the monarchic idea. It is through Jefferson's adroit use of the precedent set by Washington that the impression exists that Washington declined a third successive term because he wished to safeguard against the possible future rise of a reigning family. Jefferson nowhere expressed himself on a third not-successive term; and he was succeeded by two of his devoted disciples who maintained his policies for four terms, or until long after he was dead.

Finally, the makers of the Constitution, having devised the four years' term, felt that they had done all that was possible to enable the people to rebuke a usurper and left them free to reëlect as many times as they might choose.

Grant had the first real opportunity in our history for a third not-successive term. The movement to get it for him was organized and managed and wholly inspired by a group of politicians—his private misfortunes combined with the unsatisfactory nature of his second term made the people, even the party rank and file, hostile or indifferent.

And now we again hear talk of a third not-successive term for Mr. Cleveland, in splendid health, returning to popularity, sixty-six years young, a large political factor both among independents and among democrats.

There are also other considerations in the matter besides precedent. But the precedent—Jefferson's imitation of Washington's example for a reason which Washington would have repudiated, and that an imitation as to three successive terms only—does not seem so strong on analysis as it is popularly supposed to be.

The Job that Pays More

AARON BURR used to say that "Never put off till to-morrow what you can do to-day" was a maxim for lazy men—that the progressive man put off doing as long as possible in order that action might have all possible light. There is much in favor of this view—but let lazy, self-excusing men move cautiously in adopting it. In the same manner "Seize opportunity by the forelock" is a motto for the lazy and the dim-eyed.

To the energetic, capable man opportunities rarely come singly. They come in flocks, they linger and they return. He finds that he cannot take in all, that it is not wise to take the first that offers, that it is folly to jump at any. He comes to disregard the conspicuous but extremely rare instance of the fellow who soared high by jumping at his first opportunity blindly, just as he disregards the instance of the lazy man who slouched upon a fortune. The motto for him is:

"Don't resign your present job solely because another offers a little higher pay."

The Lesson of Decoration Day

DECORATION DAY, as we have it now, is one of those popular customs which, like Jonah's gourd, have grown so fast and into such huge proportions that we have almost forgotten why the seeds of them were planted in the first place.

Soon after the close of the Civil War a few sorrowing Southern women met one May day in a little village churchyard to lay flowers upon the graves of some men who were dear to them, and who had given their lives in vain for a cause which was lost. The idea quickly spread through both the South and North. The next year in many a village and town flowers were laid tenderly on the graves of the dead of both armies. Then military ceremonies were added, and by degrees orations more or less political became a feature of the day. Now the observance of the day is national; there is probably not a city or hamlet from one ocean to the other which does not thus honor its dead soldiers. Flowers and flags are laid also upon the graves of the heroes of the Revolutionary, the Mexican and the Spanish wars. This is right.

But isn't there something narrow in this purely military annual ceremony? If it is good for us once a year

"With uncovered head
To salute the sacred dead," why limit our homage only to those who died on the battlefield? Heroic blood throbs in brave hearts underneath the workman's grimy coat or the engineer's sooty jacket or even the calico gown of a half-starved woman, as often as under gilt braids and buttons.

We do not grudge a tear or a flower to the dead soldier. But why should we not also recognize the hero in the grave of the physician who risked his life for his patients every day; or the just judge who for many years taught a community the meaning of probity and honor, who left his children poor but died with hands clean of a bribe; or the inventor who spent his strength in perfecting a discovery which has widened and lightened all of our lives; or the man who has put his own pain and struggle into a book which has made life higher for us; or the poor obscure clergyman who starved body and soul and counted nothing lost if he might bring some lost wretch nearer to God? Surely these men have also served their kind and their country, and deserve some recognition at their hands.

In France, once a year, in every village the graves of those who were worthy and loved in life are heaped with flowers. This is the immortality which the poor give to their nameless heroes.

In Cornwall, in an old hamlet where King Arthur was born, there are a few graves on a wind-blown hill, and there forty years ago was buried an Italian sailor who gave his life to save his crew. Forty years ago, yet every year on All Saints' Day the villagers have laid a crown of evergreen on his grave.

Is there no lofty lesson of bravery and love taught in that poor wreath?

Do we wish to teach our boys on Decoration Day that there is no way for them to serve their country or their kind but by shooting or being shot?

Cannot the lesson be widened and lifted a little?

The Odds Against You

A FEW nights ago several successful working men and working women—two lawyers, an editor, an artist, a doctor, two merchants, a banker and a playwright—were dining at the house of one of them in New York City. The talk drifted to success against odds, and the lawyer said: "Of course, there can't be a victory unless there's a battle. Still, the odds can be too heavy."

"I should have agreed with you last month," said the merchant, "but now——" And he told this story.

"One afternoon in the fall of 1899 a woman came into the office of the Superintendent of one of New York City's free technical schools. She said: 'I am from ——, Illinois; it's a little place that you may never have heard of. My husband and I were born and raised there, and we've got four children. He's a carpenter. We've been thinking for several years now that we ought to do something to get on in the world. And finally we decided that we couldn't begin younger. So we just packed up and came. We want to learn to be builders. He's going to get a job as carpenter and I'm going to go to school and learn drawing and the building business generally. He'll go to night school, and I'll teach him what I learn, too.'

"The Superintendent tried not to show in his face what was in his mind. For the woman was about thirty years old but looked forty-five, so thin and stooped and badly groomed and badly dressed was she. And she had that dazed expression which a person who has never been in the city wears when he is adrift in one for the first time. The Superintendent tried to discourage her, but she seemed unable to comprehend what he was saying, and at each pause returned to her original proposal with a doggedness that seemed as stupid as it was irritating.

"She entered a drawing class and set to work. Her husband could get nothing to do in New York—he was not a member of a trades union and couldn't get into one. A place on a job in Porto Rico was offered to him and he went, sending out of his wages the money for the support of the wife and the four little ones. The woman worked hard at the school and soon surprised the Superintendent. Her face lost the dazed, 'downtrodden' expression. She learned how to do her hair and how to put on her clothes and how to carry herself. Also she learned her lessons at school—she wasn't brilliant, but she was indefatigable and desperately in earnest.

"After two years her husband returned from Porto Rico and she and he and the children went back to Illinois as poor as when they came.

"And," concluded the merchant, "the middle of last month my friend the Superintendent got a letter from the woman, saying that they were doing very well, that they had just got their first big contract and were practically certain to clear a large sum on it."

There are some people—a good many—who have disagreeable things to say about marriage. This is a good story to tell them. True, there are hundreds and hundreds of couples marrying to-day into what will be unhappiness and catastrophe. But there are thousands and thousands of couples marrying to-day into just such a partnership as that of this carpenter and his wife; and those couples are the significant ones. This is a land of working men and working women. A working man or woman can get on alone, but when you get the combination of a working man and a working woman in partnership "to get on in the world" and to bring up a family of boys and girls who will have the ideals that cluster round work as fruit clusters on a healthy tree—why, where is its superior and how can it be beaten?

Again, this carpenter's wife is a rebuke, and should be an inspiration, to every man and every woman now whining that he or she "has no chance." Have you no capital? Neither had she. Have you no friends? No more had she. Is your youth gone? So was hers. Have you a poor education? She had almost none. It matters not what handicap self-excuse may bring forward for her, or hers or Miss Nobody's, this woman had it—and she had four helpless children to carry on her bent back.

PRESIDENTS THAT PUSH

THE REASONS FOR THEIR SUCCESS MADE CLEAR IN THE RECORD OF THEIR CAREERS

By Forrest Crissey

IN EVERY atom of his being President Samuel M. Felton, of the Chicago and Alton Railway, is a constructionist. The genius for building runs in his blood. For him to see a railroad property is involuntarily to plan its reconstruction.

How substantially his capacities in this elemental field of railroad work are recognized may be told in a single statement: For various reorganization committees and for the United States Courts Mr. Felton made, inside a period of five years, fifteen special reports — reports upon which hung the investment of millions of dollars and the expenditure of millions more. And when he made his last report of this kind, on the Alton road, he was told, in effect: "You say this can be converted into one of the soundest railroad properties in America. Very well; go ahead and make good your own recommendations." This is how he came to be president of the Chicago and Alton, and how that line came to be reconstructed from a notoriously ill-conditioned road into a line universally recognized as a model of the most modern and progressive constructive methods.

Probably Mr. Felton is as good an example of what is sometimes called "railroad precocity" as may be found in the country. At twenty years he was a chief engineer, at twenty-one a general superintendent, at twenty-nine a general manager, at thirty-two a vice-president, and at thirty-seven a president. This effectively answers the question: Has the young man a chance to get to the top in railroading?

But President Felton had one distinct advantage. He came of sound railroad stock, his father being one of the veteran presidents of the Atlantic seaboard. Before he was ten years old young Felton knew every piece in a locomotive and could give points in construction to the average section boss. He was his father's constant companion in inspection trips over the line, and the officials were plied with questions in a volume possible only to the alert and acquisitive boy of ten or a dozen years.

Although, at fifty, Mr. Felton is accorded a reputation as a "construction president" scarcely eclipsed by that of any man in America, he feels — according to the testimony of his intimates — almost as great a personal pride in the fact that he is a graduate of "Tech." (the Massachusetts Institute of Technology) as in any of his achievements as a builder of railroads. His loyalty to this famous engineering and scientific school is intense and he will warm to any caller who has won honors in this institution. Vacation intervals, during his school years, were employed in hard service "in the field," with a surveying gang, as rodman, leveler, transit man and field engineer. He began to "draw railroad money" at the age of fifteen.

Up to the time when he found an opportunity to show his hand in reconstruction his record of advancement reads: Entered service August, 1868, as rodman; 1870, leveler and assistant engineer Lancaster road; 1872, engineer in charge of surveys Chester and Paoli road; 1873, chief engineer Chester and Delaware River Railroad; 1874, general superintendent Pittsburg, Cincinnati and St. Louis Railway.

A General Manager at Twenty-Nine

THIS brought him to the position of general manager of the antiquated New York and New England Railroad, with which he began the year of 1882. In opening the Hudson River extension of that line and improving the entire road he demonstrated his capacity for constructive work so effectively that in February, 1884, he was made assistant to the president of the New York, Lake Erie and Western, in special charge of the New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio Railroad, which was in a dilapidated condition. Here he accomplished a task of rehabilitation which brought him still greater reputation.

Then came his first important traffic position, as vice-president of the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad Company. Another year made him first vice-president of this line in charge of both traffic and operation.

His first presidency was that of the East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia road, and the Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific Railway. After the failure of the Richmond and West Point Terminal System, which controlled the above lines, he became receiver of the Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific.

This property was, in the phrase of the time, an "artistic wreck" both physically and financially. Before 1900 he turned the road back to its owners with roadbed and equipment in thoroughly first-class condition and entirely divested of its huge burden of debt and with money in its treasury. And this remarkable task was accomplished in the years of general panic and financial depression beginning in 1893 and ending in 1899 — a feat which has been the marvel of the railroad world.

Editor's Note — This is the second in Mr. Crissey's series of papers on successful railroad men.

PRESIDENT S. M. FELTON

Mr. Felton was made president of the Chicago and Alton road in September, 1899. Here his problem was practically that of making a first-class road out of "two streaks of rust and a right-of-way." Bridges were too light to carry modern equipment; locomotives were of the old-fashioned pattern and the cars of small capacity.

At once he ordered fifty new locomotives and over five thousand modern cars. Then he proceeded to rebuild the road, one division at a time. This involved new bridges also. To develop an adequate business for a reconstructed line implied a big increase in tonnage, and this could be profitably handled only by cutting down grades and reducing tonnage cost by the soundest constructive work. Now this labor on almost one thousand miles of road is practically finished. The coal business of the line, under Mr. Felton's direct management, has jumped from $19,000 in October, 1898, to $127,000 for the corresponding month in 1902; the freight earnings from $370,000 in October, 1898, to $470,000 in October of last year, and the passenger earnings in the same time from $221,000 to $282,000. He has spent about twelve million dollars in three years in equipment — bridges, rails, ballasting, signals, frogs and switches, side and double tracks, yards and roundhouses, remodeled shops and stations, and all the improvements necessary to convert a line that had been living in the past into a road unsurpassed in its physical condition by any in the West. That this work of reconstruction amply provides for the future is indicated by the fact that its average of tons per train mile in 1898 was 187, as against a present average of 382. What this means will be best understood by the practical railroad man; probably it cannot be fully appreciated by the lay mind.

How President Leeds Made His Millions

WILLIAM B. LEEDS, of the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway, is perhaps the wealthiest of all the Western railroad presidents. While trustworthy figures are difficult to obtain, it is possible he may actually be distanced by one or two competitors, but the general belief in railway circles accords him first place — an interesting fact when it is remembered that he is the latest recruit to the presidential corps.

So recent is his arrival among the railroad makers that popular impression credits him with being a novice in practical railroading and is inclined to rate him only as a dashing speculator, a "combination" organizer and a "tin-plate magnate."

But those who class the president of the Rock Island as one who has "bought his way in at the top," and must rely upon subordinates for a working knowledge of railway construction and operation, are far from the facts.

The erroneousness of such an impression is effectively established by the simple statement that Mr. Leeds has seen eleven years of active service in the employ of the Pennsylvania system — perhaps the most superb training-school for railroad talent in America.

Shortly after he had cast his first vote he enlisted with a Pennsylvania engineering corps. Two years later he was assistant engineer of a division. His quick grasp of construction problems soon compelled the attention of the management and he was given charge of "maintenance of right-of-way" for the important Cincinnati Division of the Pennsylvania. Then, in 1890, his executive capacities were complimented by his transfer into the operating branch. As superintendent of the division extending from Cincinnati to Logansport, Indiana, he faced almost every railway problem that can come to an official lower in rank than the general manager — for the division superintendency under the Pennsylvania system of control carries with it an amount of authority not generally attached to that position.

Inevitably he was brought into close touch with the industrial opportunities which the great "gas belt" of the Hoosier State offered. In 1891 he thought he saw an opportunity to make a modest fortune in the establishment of an enterprise for the manufacture of tin plate. Then the industry was literally in its infancy, and America relied upon Wales for this product. Many of his friends believed that he was foredoomed to failure; but he resigned his railroad position, with its flattering promises of promotion, "burned his bridges" and plunged into practically an untried field.

Here his abilities as a financier came rapidly to the surface. His venture was an immediate success. Very soon he saw the possibilities of consolidating the main tin-plate plants in the country. His campaign was quick and decisive. He succeeded in the enterprise and found himself, in 1894, president of the American Tin Plate Company, which came eventually to control that product in the United States. Then he pushed the consolidation idea to still greater lengths and assisted in bringing about the absorption of the American Tin Plate Company by the United States Steel Corporation — a transaction which made him a multi-millionaire.

Meantime, with Daniel G. Reid, W. H. Moore and J. H. Moore, he had become interested in three large steel companies which were also finally absorbed by the "Billion Dollar" steel combine.

This strong group of men, with energy equal to their wealth, turned their attention from manufacturing to railroading and began to cast about for a property capable of great expansion and development. The Rock Island seemed to offer the best inducement, and by a sharp and skillful financial campaign they secured the coveted control.

From Tin Plate to Steel Rails

Mr. Leeds' thorough grounding in practical railroad work fitted him to become the active executive of the enterprise, and in January, 1902, he became president of the road, which was then less than four thousand miles in extent, with its Western terminus at Colorado Springs, Colorado. In this property and its connections he saw the framework of a great, independent, transcontinental system, spreading out to California on the West and Old Mexico on the South.

With this ambition held steadily before him he settled himself to its accomplishment. His first stroke was to acquire the Choctaw, Oklahoma and Gulf Railroad. This added twelve hundred miles to his system and tapped the rich and rapidly developing region of Oklahoma, Indian Territory, Arkansas and Kansas, with a main line from Memphis, Tennessee, to Amarillo, Texas.

Then the St. Louis, Kansas City and Colorado line was acquired, adding three hundred miles and a very important territory to the system. Also, in 1902, the Burlington, Cedar Rapids and Northern, and the Rock Island and Peoria lines, with their fifteen hundred miles of roadway, were taken into the swiftly-growing system, giving it the important terminal points of Peoria, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Sioux Falls and Watertown. Next an extension linking the main line with the El Paso line was begun in order to give practically the entire South a new and direct route to Mexico and the Pacific Coast through the Memphis gateway.

Meantime Mr. Leeds pushed the work on his extensions to Fort Worth and Galveston, Texas, and other smaller "feeders," until, with the first year of his presidency, his system had eight thousand miles of main track — double that with which he had started. And this achievement involved making tributary to the system every article of the wide range of natural products of the Great Middle West — from the wheat fields and cattle ranges of Minnesota and the Dakotas to the cotton and rice fields of the far South.

Its traffic zone is fifteen hundred miles long and one thousand miles wide, embracing the principal cities of the great Middle West and Southwest, and reaching from Chicago to the Pacific Coast and to the Gulf of Mexico.

The Young Woman in Business

By Mrs. George Benedict Carpenter

TO THE woman about to enter business life I would say: Do not give up your social life and connections; they will serve as a foil to your business environment and you will enjoy them as never before. They will give you variety, balance, relaxation and a personal life in which your own individuality has its proper place without regard to the world of affairs. You will be a better and more capable business woman for going into society—even though this sometimes implies making your toilet and being out late when you are tired and would prefer to be resting comfortably at home.

Men in business, it should be remembered, have, mixed with the routine of the daily grind of commercialism, a companionship and a semi-social intercourse from which the society woman in business is almost completely barred. She must draw the line between the business and the social side of her life very sharply and maintain this distinction at all costs. From first to last I found the problem of business life that of reconciling conflicting interests and personalities, and of altering the views, prejudices and determinations of men to meet your own; this called for the exercise of the same faculty which the woman in society must always employ: Tact! When I entered the business field I determined that the day when I had property enough to yield me a certain income I would retire into private life. After ten years of hard work I found that I had accomplished the task I had set for myself and was at liberty to retire. At the end of six years heavy financial reverses again brought me into business life. But I had now the capital of experience and the reputation of having been successful.

A Fresh Start in Business

This time I determined to build upon no foundation which had been laid by another. Success or failure would be wholly my own, so I resolved to organize from the bottom the enterprise in which I was to embark. There was an exhilaration and enthusiasm in this work which I was not able to feel in my former business in mastering the details of which I had to depend upon employees. This was my business, from start to finish, and the zeal which it inspired in me compels the counsel that a young woman entering into business should, if possible, be the originator of the enterprise which she undertakes.

Editor's Note—This is the second of Mrs. Carpenter's two papers.

My second enterprise was in line with my tastes and experiences. In other words, I took up the line of work which seemed nearest at hand and to which I believed myself best adapted. This is generally a safe rule to follow. In the management of a large public auditorium I had naturally come into contact with musical artists, entertainers and platform speakers. At the beginning of my second incursion into the world of affairs I aimed to manage musical talent and entertainers for small local concerts and private programs. My field grew beyond all my expectations, and at the end of the first year I had four times more income from my enterprise than I had anticipated. While I recognized that luck and opportunity must to some extent be reckoned with in determining the elements of any success, there was much personal satisfaction in the thought that I had worked out every step in the progress of this enterprise. The lessons taught me by this second undertaking were far more definite, significant and interesting than those of the first attempt.

The nature of the work brought to me scores of young women who claimed to be very anxious for advice as to how to solve the problems of self-support. Most of them, however, really came to secure influence which would help to place them on the stage or the platform. There was scarcely a day in those two years in which from three to twenty women did not call upon me for some purpose of this kind.

In consequence of these talks I have given not a little time to a serious review of my business experiences, with the view of summarizing their lessons in a few practical suggestions. If the daughter of a close and dear friend should come to me with the announcement that she found herself compelled to earn a livelihood, and perhaps to contribute to the support of her family; that she had not the marked gifts to insure success in artistic lines and therefore must take up some business, and that she wished me to give her the benefit of my own experience, I should advise her somewhat after this manner:

Don'ts for Business Women

Take a good, plain, practical business, in line with your own natural bent of taste and training. In making this selection take counsel with a friend who has made a large success in business and who sees things in a big way. Go to him occasionally, as you work out your plans; give him a frank insight into your affairs and induce him to point out the weak spots in your methods. Do not allow yourself to get into a rut; judge your methods by results, and, if these are not satisfactory, probe until you find the weakness in your management and then throw all your energies into a remedial plan.

Meet men on their own ground, neither asking nor secretly expecting special consideration in a business way because you are a woman; at the same time meet men always in a woman's way, remembering that the slightest loss of femininity, in thought or bearing, is a loss of power and of all that is dear and vital to a woman. To be more explicit on this point: do not, for example, sign your name in such a manner that it may be mistaken for that of a man. This is bad taste and bad business policy. Be frank to a fault and indulge in no directions which might help to obscure, even for the moment, the fact that you are a woman.

Cultivate a habit of democracy in seeing callers. The woman in business who hedges herself about with red tape and renders access to her office in the least difficult, overlooks two points in human nature. These are, that many business men are a bit shy in transacting business with a woman in her office, and would resent being denied an interview by a woman even under circumstances in which they would think nothing of it were a similar denial to come from a man. That there is something of a prejudice among business men against the entry of members of the opposite sex into the field of affairs cannot be denied. This critical attitude should be recognized and guarded against by special vigilance. Charges of "fussiness," of ultra-conventionality, of "drawing-room" methods, and other supposed feminine failings should be disarmed by a deliberate policy of democratic accessibility, directness and simplicity.

For the same reasons, special promptness should be a rigid rule. Keep your engagements with religious exactness, whether they are appointments for interviews or agreements to meet financial obligations, or relate to correspondence.

Take particular pains with your correspondence. Make a study of the letters which you receive from those who write what they wish to say and no more; whose correspondence expresses not only the delicate shadings of their thought, but also conforms to the relationship which they bear to you or which they would have you think you bear. Form your own letters on these models and make them fittingly concise and to the point, without being frigidly stiff and prim. It is perhaps better to err on the side of courtesy and friendliness than on the other. Or, to put it differently, do not feel that because you are a woman you are forever barred from dropping a friendly word in a business letter to a correspondent whom you know especially well.

As to Business Clothes

Always look well in your business clothes. Give as conscientious care to your toilet before you go to your office as you would if you were going to a ball instead. In these days of tailor-made street gowns and shirtwaists it is possible for any woman, no matter how busy, always to have on hand a costume entirely suitable to business wear and at the same time having the qualities of neatness and simple elegance. Slovenly dress, and especially unkempt hair, are particularly offensive to the average business man, and can do more to handicap a woman's business career than the most brilliant talents for finance can overcome.

Above all, cultivate tact—and that is by no means the synonym of duplicity. Then, with equal diligence, school yourself in perseverance. If inclined to take an uncheerful view of your affairs go to the theatre, the opera, or some social function in which you can be pleasantly diverted for a few hours. After this wholesome change of atmosphere come courageously to your problem and look it squarely in the face. If you do not find the outlook substantially and reasonably what it should be, search until the weak spots are located. Perhaps your confidential adviser may assist you in this process. Or, it may take the developments of business system to bring these facts to light. I know a woman in business, in Chicago, whose affairs are prospering to a remarkable degree. Yet she came to me in search of a young woman who could be depended upon so to systematize the records of her transactions as to indicate with certainty where she was losing, where her profits came from, what lines of her enterprise were expanding and what departments were being carried along by the prosperity of the successful branches. This procedure is far more sound and businesslike than to wait for a loss to show in the grand balance.

After every advisory conversation in which I ever participated had reached its supposed end, there has always been a pitiful exclamation: "Oh, if I were only sure that I am doing the thing for which I am best fitted!" But you cannot know. All you can do is to use your best judgment and then plunge heartily ahead as a man would. Generally, circumstances give some helping hint in this direction. If the instances already referred to have not made this sufficiently clear let me cite another—the case of a Chicago woman who is a successful real estate agent. When she found that she must earn her own livelihood she appealed to a friend for advice. He had no position to offer, but owned a tract of fine residence property on the North Shore. This he offered to place in her hands for sale on a commission basis. She eagerly grasped this first opening, applied herself to the study of "North Shore values," sold the property, and has now become an authority in that special field of real estate in Chicago.

Instead of littering up your desk with letter files and letter-books—you keep the entire correspondence in a heavy manila folder, placing copies of your replies with the letters which they answer—all in order.

You file the folder vertically (on edge) in a cabinet drawer, where it's kept upright by a compressor.

You obtain this result: Your whole correspondence with one concern, upon one subject, is always together; you can lay your hand on it instantly.

A Judge Commends Pure Food

A Judge of a Colorado Court said: "Nearly one year ago I began the use of Grape-Nuts as a food. Constant confinement indoors and the monotonous grind of office duties had so weakened and impaired my mental powers that I felt the imperative need of something which neither doctors nor food specialists seemed able to supply.

"A week's use of Grape-Nuts twice each day convinced me that some unusual and marvelous virtue was contained therein. My mental vigor returned with astonishing rapidity; brain weariness (from which I had constantly suffered) quickly disappeared; clearness of thought and intellectual health and activity which I had never previously known were to me the plain results of a few months' use of this food.

"Unhesitatingly I commend Grape-Nuts as the most remarkable food preparation which science has ever produced so far as my knowledge and experience extends." Name and address furnished by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The Judge is right. Grape-Nuts food is a certain and remarkable brain builder and can be relied upon. There's a reason.

"Well, so long as you love me still!" she exclaimed with a little mocking laugh. "That's the great thing, isn't it? I mean for me, of course. I am greedy for love. It makes me feel so safe and comfortable to think that there are whole rows of men that love me. When you have a great fortune you begin to appreciate the things that money cannot buy."

"Oh, your money," he said. That word in her mouth always stung him.

"Well, you ought to hate my money," she remarked cheerfully. "It queered you, didn't it? And then all rich people are detestable, anyway—selfish to the core and horrid. Do you know that sometimes, when I have flirted awfully with a man at a dinner or somewhere, and the next day he telephones—and the telephone is in the next room—I've just said: 'Oh, bother, tell him I'm out.'"

"I thought I might be treated the same way," he said.

"Then you thought wrong, Frank," she returned, with a sudden change from her tone of flippancy and lightness. "I haven't sunk quite so low as that, you know; I meant other people—I didn't mean you, Frank dear."

This was said with such a little ring of kindness that Frank was moved.

"Then the old days still count for something?" he said.

"Oh, yes," she said.

"But not enough to hurt?" he ventured.

"Sometimes they do and sometimes they don't," she returned. "It depends on how good a time I'm having. But I hate to think I am weak and selfish and vain, and that the only person I really care for is myself. I value my self-esteem and it often gets an awful jar." Her eyes were unusually brilliant and her cheeks were pink enough to have been rouged. The sight of her old lover had stirred many memories in her bosom.

"And what about my job, Florence," he said, changing the conversation. "I've caught the yachting idea, too. Can it be managed?"

"Oh, I want to talk to you about that," she said.

"Well, go on," he said, as she hesitated.

"I am so afraid of hurting your feelings, Frank," she said with a singular timidity.

"My feelings are probably tougher than you think," he returned. "No, be quite open with me, please."

"You will think so badly of me," she said. "You will be affronted."

"It sounds as though you wanted to engage me for your butler," he said. Then, as she still withheld the words on her lips, he went on: "Don't be uneasy about saying it, Florence. If it's impossible—why—that's the end of it, of course, and no harm done."

"I want you to come," she said simply.

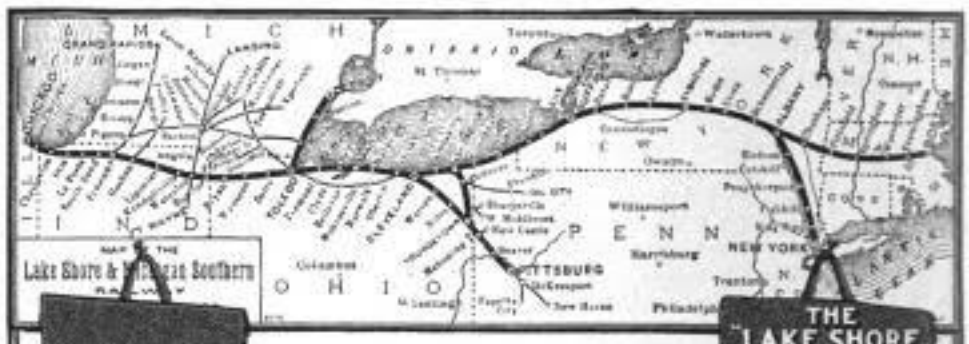
"Then what's the trouble?" he demanded, getting more and more mystified. "I don't mind being an artificer the least bit. I'm fond of working with my hands. I'm a good mechanic and I like it."

"I want you for my chief engineer," she said.

This was news indeed. Frank's face betrayed his keen pleasure. He had never soared to the heights of asking or expecting that.

"I had to dismiss the last one," she went on. "That's the reason why I'm still here, and not two days out as I had expected. He locked himself in his cabin and shot at people through the door, and told awful lies to the newspapers."

"If it's anything about my qualifications," he said, thinking he had found the reason of her backwardness, "I don't fancy I'll have any trouble to satisfy you. I don't want to toot my own horn, Florence, but really, you know, I am rated a first-class man. I'll prove that by my certificates and all that, or give me two weeks' trial and see for yourself."



"Oh, it isn't that," she said.

"Then what the deuce is it?" he broke out.

"Frank," she returned, "it is not a question of your competency at all. You know very well I'd trust my life to you blindfold. It's—it's the social side—the old affair between us, the first names and all that kind of thing."

"Oh, I see," he said blankly.

"As an officer on my ship," she said, "you

MEAL TIME CONSCIENCE

What Do the Children Drink?

There are times when mother or father feeds the youngsters something that they know children should not have. Perhaps it is some rich dessert, but more often it is tea or coffee. Some compromise by putting in so much hot water that there is not much tea or coffee left, but even that little is pretty certain to do harm. It leads to bigger doses. Then come the coffee ills.

It is better to have some delicious, hot, food drink that you can take yourself and feed to your children conscious that it will help and strengthen and never hurt them. A lady of Oneida, N. Y., says: "I used coffee many years in spite of the conviction that it injured my nervous system and produced my nervous headaches. While visiting a friend I was served with Postum but it was not well made, still I determined to get a package and try it myself and after following directions carefully the result was all that could be desired: a delicious, finely flavored, richly colored beverage. Since I quit coffee Postum has worked wonders for me.

"My husband who always suffered from kidney trouble when drinking coffee quit the coffee and took up Postum with me, and since drinking Postum he has felt stronger and better with no indication of kidney trouble.

"You may be sure I find it a great comfort to have a warm drink at meals that I can give my children with a clear conscience that it will help them and not hurt them as coffee or tea would." Name furnished by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

could easily put yourself and me in a difficult position. In a way, we'll really be further apart than if you were in South America and I in Europe, for though we'd always be good friends and all that, the formalities would have to be observed. Now I have offended you?" she added, putting out her hand appealingly.

"I think you might have known me better, Florence," he returned. "I am not offended—what right have I to be offended?—only a little hurt, perhaps, to think that you could doubt me for a single moment in such a matter. I shall treat you precisely as I should any owner of any ship I sailed on," he said. "That is, with respect and always preserving my distance. I will never address you first except to say good-morning and good-evening, and will show no concern if you do not speak to me for days on end. Favoritism on board ship always breeds trouble," he went on, "and I shall expect none of it; while on your side you must not be offended if I appear reserved and mindful of my place."

"Oh, Frank, you are an angel," she cried.

"No," he returned, "only—as far as I can—a gentleman, Miss Fenacre."

"We needn't begin now, Frank."

"Am I in your service?" he asked.

"From to-day," she answered, "and I will give you a note to Captain Landry."

"Then you will be Miss Fenacre to me from now on," he said.

"You must say good-by to Florence first," she said, smiling. "You may kiss my hand," she said, as she gave it to him. "You used to do it so gallantly in the old days—such a Spaniard that you are, Frank—and I liked it so much!"

He did so, and for the first time in his life with a kind of shame.

"I hope we are not both of us making a terrible mistake, Florence," he said.

"Oh, I couldn't want a better chief engineer," she said, "and as for you it's the wisest thing you ever did. It's I, after all, who am making the sacrifice, for in a month or two all the gilt will wear off and you will see me as I really am. You will find it very disillusioning to go to sea with your divinity," she added. "You will discover she is a very flesh-and-blood affair, after all, Frank, and not worth the tip of your little finger."

"I had a good many opportunities of judging before," he replied, "and the more I knew her the more I loved her."

"Well, I am changed now," she said. "I suppose all the bad has come to the surface since—like the slag when they melt iron and skim it off with dippers—only with me there's nobody to dip. If I am astounded at the difference what do you suppose you'll be?"

"There never could be any difference to me," he said.

"That's the only kind of love worth talking about," she said, going to the window.

For a while neither of them spoke. Frank rose and stood with his hat in his hand waiting to take his departure. Florence turned, and going to an escretoire sat down and wrote a few lines on a card.

"Present this to Captain Landry," she said; "and now, my dear chief engineer, I will give you your congé."

He thanked her and put the card carefully in his pocketbook.

"What a farce it all is, Frank," she broke out. "There's something wrong in a system that gives a girl millions of dollars to do just as she likes with. I don't care what they say to the contrary; I believe women were meant to belong to men, to live in semi-slavery and do what they are told, to bring up children and travel with the pots and pans, and find their only reward in pleasing their husbands."

"I shouldn't care to pass an opinion," said Frank. "Some of them are happy that way, no doubt."

"What does anybody want except to be happy?" she continued in the same strain of resentment. "Isn't that what all are trying for as hard as they can? I'd like to go out in the street and stop people as they came along and ask them the one after the other: 'Would you mind telling me if you are happy?' And the one that said 'yes' I'd give a hundred dollars to!"

"As like as not it would be some shabby fellow with no overcoat," said Frank.

"Now you can go away," she exclaimed suddenly. "I don't know what's the matter with me, Frank; I think I'm going to cry! Go, go!" she cried imperiously as he still stood there.

Frank bowed and obeyed, and his last glimpse as he closed the door was of her at the window, looking down disconsolately into the street.

Advertising as a Factor
In Business Development

A SURVEY OF THE FIELD AND THE PROBABILITIES OF YOUNG MEN AND WOMEN WINNING SUCCESS THROUGH MAIL INSTRUCTION

Why Salaries From $100.00 to $500.00 a Month are Paid

"More Business Men than ever are today being trained for their own necessities"

By GEORGE H. POWELL

ABOUT three years ago an advertiser, who had spent over $7,000.00 within twelve months on mail order specialties, called on me for consultation. It seems that in return for this expenditure he had succeeded in selling a bare $1,000.00 worth of his product, and it was a very serious problem at this juncture as to whether he would better suspend activities and stop further losses or look for an expert who would be able to organize winning methods.

An inspection of his establishment revealed numerous glaring errors in organization and advertising. It appeared, among other things, that he had received over 6,000 inquiries in reply to his magazine advertisements, and that about one in five who had taken the trouble to answer the ads. actually sent a cash order. This average of one purchaser for every five inquirers would have been satisfactory had the advertisements cost say twenty-five cents per inquiry, and had the outfits brought from $2.00 to $5.00 each instead of only seventy-five cents. The nature of the goods practically precluded duplicate orders, so the proposition necessarily required the maximum of cash with first order to prove a success.

Had a trained ad. writer been in charge the advertisements would not have cost over twenty-five cents each, in which case the advertiser would have received enough money to have at least paid for his publicity, within a few hundred dollars, and it would not, therefore, have been a costly experiment. And, moreover, it would shortly have been apparent that a readjustment of the outfit price represented a good profit. In short, inquiries that can be had at twenty-five or thirty cents each, where one in five orders, will return immediate profit when $2.00 and upward is remitted on each outfit.

A fundamental knowledge of advertising gives anyone a key which will open the door to success and an understanding as to what "proposition" means in any ad. While no two things may require the same or stereotyped treatment, yet the basic principles once acquired are a safeguard against great losses and failures.

Of course, a proposition calling for $100.00 remittances, as is often the case, can stand for inquiries costing from $5.00 up, according to conditions, but the averages must always harmonize and the ultimate possibilities be known.

In the case of the business man referred to, I soon showed him how to readjust his business and turn loss into profit, chiefly through a better style of advertisements.

I mention this case to show how great is the need of trained writers of advertising, who not only save the untrained merchant or manufacturer endless worry and labor in the preparation of copy, but who also avoid the foolish waste of large sums of money in periodical space.

Again referring to the advertiser who lost some $5,000.00 because he didn't understand the elements of ad-writing, the pertinent question is—how much could he have afforded in way of yearly salary to a skillful ad. writer? Suppose it is set at $2,500.00, and an estimate of results drawn? The loss of thousands averted and a substantial profit substituted.

While such a salary is of course out of proportion to an annual expenditure approximating only $7,000.00, yet I submit it for analytical purposes.

And I may say that the partial realization of this, added to the enormous expansion of business throughout America, are the chief reasons why such brilliant possibilities await intelligent young men and women who qualify and make the most of the advertising skill they acquire.

The country needs them and their work, and as never before, but will tolerate no half-heartedness or unsteadfastness of purpose. The prizes are for the faithful only.

In these busy times, when commerce moves with thousand-mile strides and at lightning speed, there isn't much show or pity for the old school business men who jog along as their grandfathers did before them—patient and plodding and in collision with the swiftly moving modern methods which produce almost immediate results.

There is much in the theory of "the cumulative effect of advertising," but the "hammering effect," when it can be employed, is going to be a feature of the immediate future.

I am especially conscious of this through my somewhat extensive correspondence with representative business men from Maine to California who come to me both for the purpose of acquiring skill in the preparation of their own ads. and in seeking my competent graduates to fill their advertising departments. More business men than ever are today being trained for their own necessities.

Every week now adds to the list of converts to the new idea of progressive advertising, and I hazard no conservatism in saying that within the next ten years to come there will be almost as many professional writers of advertising as there are today publishers. We are rapidly approaching a new era, simply because the order of the day is the stoppage of losses at every point, and the very appearance of so much commonplace advertising now existent is ample proof of the needed reforms in the preparation of up-to-date ads. to replace those which now entail heavy losses.

Those of THE POST readers who have heard of the great success of the Powell System of Correspondence instruction and who have seen its practical effects in training ambitious people to fill fine salaried positions, will not be surprised at the statement that I am teaching so many notable business men, since the supply of available ad. writers is much in the minority to the demand. That the Powell System teaches ad. writing in best manner and in the shortest time is a matter of acknowledged record, and my plans to make this chosen work broad and applicable to all enterprises, as well as to the paid writer, will interest many.

To all POST readers who are interested in the profits of good advertising I will gladly mail on request my beautiful new Prospectus, the most explicit work of its kind ever published. Simply address me, George H. Powell, 198 Temple Court, New York, N. Y.

Humorists of the Pencil

it is because we dislike to give up our old traditions. The modern Uncle Sam should be a clean, up-to-date, aggressive business man with million-dollar bills sticking from his pockets and a copy of the Monroe Doctrine embossed on his shirt-front. Then he would be typical of us.

As a general thing, politicians and public men have a kindly feeling for cartoonists, even though the latter sometimes handle them "without gloves." Publicity is a statesman's most valuable asset, and cartoons are as good as first-page display advertisements in giving him publicity. At the Gridiron dinner in Washington Senator Hanna was discussing the subject of cartoons with a friend. The latter suggested that the Senator could not have a very kindly feeling for cartoons on account of the many unpleasant ones that had been made of him in the campaign of 1896. "Not much," said the Senator. "Why, I wouldn't have missed those cartoons for a million dollars. I didn't mind them so much, and they did me a world of good." It is safe to say that no cartoonist that comes under the kindly spell of Senator Hanna's personality can go back to his drawing-board and draw him as the arch-enemy of the workingman and the embodiment of all that is heartless in capital.

The "Easy Marks" of Caricature

It is a curious fact that most public men of high standing have some marked individuality that makes them easy subjects for caricature. If they haven't they should speedily cultivate something that will make them distinctive. Senator Peffer's fame was undoubtedly due to his whiskers. The very minute that he dawned on the political horizon the cartoonists of all papers leaped at him with avidity and he at once became a national character. Senator Hanna is easily caricatured; Mr. Bryan and Mr. McKinley were both good subjects; David B. Hill, Thomas Platt, Richard Croker, Senator Depew, J. P. Morgan—all have some distinct feature that makes them easily recognizable in caricature. President Roosevelt is fortunate in being "unique" in his appearance. His eyeglasses and his teeth make him a shining mark. Mr. Cleveland is always recognizable in front, side or rear view, for the picture of a stout gentleman out fishing would instantly suggest the portly ex-President to every mind. It is known that Mr. Cleveland does not resent the cartoons that are made of him, even though they may show him as being much too stout and much less handsome than he is. A cartoon was sent to him some time since with the compliments of the cartoonist. In it the ex-President was sitting in a boat fishing and from a neighboring bank President Roosevelt was inviting him to represent the United States at King Edward's coronation. Mr. Cleveland responded: "Can't go. Have a bite." The idea was to illustrate that between "kow-towing" to royalty and "catching a nice fish" Mr. Cleveland vastly preferred the latter. In his acknowledgment of the original drawing he wrote:

"The incident and the ideas it suggests are not only amusingly suggested, but thoughtfully, except that I have not been invited to appear at the coronation either officially or unofficially, and the string of fish is wholly inadequate. I shall frame and carefully preserve the picture."

Both King Edward and the German Emperor are good subjects, the former for his beard and heavy eyes, and the latter for his distinctive mustache. It is said that the German Emperor manifested great interest in the cartoons printed in America during Prince Henry's visit to this country, and that he has large scrapbooks filled with them. He also has taken so much interest in cartoon work that he has drawn several himself.

Mr. Morgan's views as to cartoons are not known, but may be suspected. In the last two years he has been a cartoon figure second only to the President, and the predominating tone of the cartoons has been such that perhaps his love for cartoonists has not greatly increased.

A cartoonist is seldom a good judge of what will strike the popular fancy. Frequently the drawing that he labors over and considers exceedingly successful will never bring forth a single word of commendation, whereas some little feature that he regards as inconsequential may appeal to popular favor with mighty force and unanimity.

An instance in my own experience proves how true this is. At the beginning of the campaign of 1896 I was working hard and conscientiously on political cartoons. People looked at them and occasionally said pleasant things. But one day I inadvertently drew a dog—a rather ungainly but good-natured canine, merely to supply a needed detail in the composition of the cartoon. The next day, with similar purpose, I drew another dog that looked like the first dog. A subscriber wrote in and asked what the dog meant. The third day, just for fun, I drew the dog again. He was wisely listening to something Mr. Hanna was saying. A dozen letters swooped in and a dozen persons demanded to know what the dog meant. The dog then became a fixture and with each day the letters from anxious inquirers grew in number, until a perfect avalanche descended upon the office. "What does the dog mean?" "Why is that dog always around watching the progress of the campaign—now with McKinley, now with Bryan and now with Hanna?" "What is the deep-hidden significance?" All sorts of possible solutions were hazarded by the inquirers, some believing that it was a symbol that meant some foreign power. The dog became an absorbing mystery wherever the newspaper went.

Never in any case was the dog represented in bad humor. He was always good-natured, sometimes wearing a look of surprise, sometimes a look of deep concern, sometimes a look of incredulity and sometimes a look of exuberant glee. In a month it seemed to those around that particular newspaper as though the Presidential campaign had become almost totally eclipsed by the mystery of the dog. Thousands of letters came in from all corners of the country. If a day passed when the dog failed to appear there was a storm of solicitous inquiries from mothers and children, and even from men whose thoughts might presumably have been upon larger affairs. One day when Mr. Cleveland accidentally rocked on the dog's tail there was a flood of letters suggesting various remedies, and great relief the next day when the dog appeared with no visible sign of disaster beyond a bandage wound around the injured member.

The Fame of the Campaign Dog

When people spoke of me it was as author of the dog, whereas I aspired to a more honorable thing. All of my serious work apparently counted for naught, and I really began to fear that forevermore I should be known only through my association with the homely, good-natured creature that inhabited my cartoons.

In course of time I went away and the vicissitudes of fate threw my lot in the Philippines. For a time I breathed easy. But one day out in the jungle I came upon a tired soldier resting under a tree and we fell to talking of "God's country." When I casually introduced myself he started up with a glad look in his eyes and said: "You're not the man that drew the dog, are you?" A year later an Irish-American asked me the same question in the Leydenburg Mountains east of Pretoria, and the reluctant answer insured me the hospitality of the camp.

A year ago I began a series of pictures that were used once a week for the entire year. The central figure was a small country boy who owned five dogs, worth in the aggregate about $1.20. I reasoned that a small boy, next to a little dog, is about the funniest thing in the world, and for this reason might be the motif for a popular series. I followed this course through the spring, summer, winter and fall, from barefoot time back to barefoot time, from "skinning the cat," "saying a piece at school," "showing off" before the little girls, "taking care of the baby," "playing pirate," and so on through all these delightful experiences of boyhood. It was possible to introduce a good deal of sentiment in the pictures, for a small boy's life is full of it, and I found that the busy city man likes to be reminded of the days when he was a country boy and went calling on his Aunt Mary about dinner-time. Nearly every man who was a country boy had an Aunt Mary, and it does not make him mad to have some one remind him of it. In addition to the fact that the "boy" series apparently pleased men, I found that children were interested, and, of course, when the children are interested their mothers are bound to be, too. Thus far, however, the boy and his $1.20 worth of dogs have not been dramatized, which may mean that they have not quite reached the height of popularity.

GET THE Famous Warner Library

It is the only single set of books which comprises every author and the literature of the whole world. It is not only a library of reference, but a library to read. It contains the brightest and best reading from the representative writers of every age.

OFFICIALLY APPROVED BY THE NEW YORK CITY SCHOOLS, AND NEW YORK STATE REGENTS.

Do you like poetry? Warner will give you the best, from Chaucer to Tennyson, from Dante to Longfellow.

Do you like humor? Here you find Mark Twain, or Artemus Ward, cracking jokes with Aristophanes.

Do you like fiction? The romances of ancient Egypt are found side by side with Ian Maclaren, or Robert Louis Stevenson.

Do you like history? Herodotus will tell you of battles and campaigns; while Gibbon or Macaulay outlines the rise and fall of nations.

Not only this—but the rank and value of every author is summed up in a series of brilliant essays by foremost authorities.

Warner is so Complete that the largest public libraries cannot get along without it. Librarians are its most constant consulters. And it is so compact that the smallest home shelf of books finds it a necessary adjunct—for it furnishes a key to every other volume there.

The workmanship on the books themselves keeps pace with their literary quality. It is a set of books we are proud to distribute, and you will be proud to own. You will always point out the Warner Library when showing your books to your friends. It is beautifully bound, finely printed, and contains a wealth of special illustrations. If you had no other books than these you would still have

A Complete Home Library

20,000 Pages In these wonderful forty-six volumes will be found the brightest thoughts of the greatest authors—complete novels and chapters in fiction, humorous sketches, poetry, philosophy, history, travel, science, oratory, letters and essays. Translations from Persian, Hindu, Greek, Latin and all the modern languages are included. In short, the thousands of large pages fairly teem with interest and delight.

7,500 Authors This is the only work containing a complete "Dictionary of Authors," giving the correct pronunciation of the name and relative rank of each writer, his character, the names of his books, and dates of publication. This unique feature is of immense value.

Critical Essays A distinguishing feature of the Warner Library is the series of critical and interpretative essays. Every great author of every land and time is discussed by some one of the foremost living writers, who selects his masterpieces. Thus Dr. Van Dyke writes on Tennyson; W. D. Howells on Tolstoy, etc., etc.

800 Illustrations Photogravures of famous scenes and paintings, portraits, art plates, color reproductions of beautiful manuscripts—all form a wealth of attractive material profusely illustrating the Warner Library.

2,500 Synopses of Books This valuable feature is unique with the Warner Library. Brief descriptions of all the world's great books are given in the space of a few hundred words each. No one has read or can read all the books which come up in the course of conversation. But these synopses will give the busy man a glit of them all; not only novels such as "Robert Elsmere," "Ben Hur," or "Quo Vadis," but poems, dramas and technical works.

Course of Reading A systematic course of reading and study, equal to a four years' university course, has been prepared. It not only gives the system of reading, but furnishes the material itself, through the pages of the Library, and by means of an admirable Index. It is both teacher and text-book.

Less Than Half Former Prices

On account of our superior advertising facilities we were able to secure control of the entire "Memorial Edition"—newly revised and enlarged—and will supply these splendid sets while they last at only a fraction above factory prices—less than one-half the publisher's prices of the work. Despotism and Democracy appeal peculiarly to men, so that most of them wished to oblige her. He was secretly amused at the courage and capability she had shown in organizing a political reception for him on such short notice, and determined to help her through with it. By way of showing his good will, he spoke with enthusiasm of Crane to many persons, and said that he should be pleased if Crane might be his colleague after the first of January.

At seven o'clock he was obliged to take his train. Before he stepped into the carriage of the Judge, who had asked the honor of driving him to the station, Senator Bicknell expressed to Annette the most sincere gratitude and pleasure at his visit.

"Tell Mr. Crane," he whispered to her, "that with a wife who has such masterly capacity for political management as you, my dear Mrs. Crane, he may expect any sort of promotion. If our State is honored by being awarded the Vice-Presidential nomination, I am afraid no one else will be heard of except Mr. Crane, if you take the affair in charge."

"You are laughing at me," cried Annette, laughing herself, but coloring with pleasure at Senator Bicknell's kind manner and flattering words. "Imagine me as a political manager!"

"My dear lady, the only political managers in the world among women are those like yourself, who don't know that they are managing. Good-by, and a thousand thanks. I have not spent so pleasant a day for a long time. Remember, when you come to Washington you are to dine with me many times, but I can't make you enjoy your dinner as much as I enjoyed mine. Regards to Crane." And he stepped into his carriage.

Crane did not return until the next evening, and was greeted by the sensational news of Senator Bicknell's visit. Annette was, of course, full of her achievement in entertaining the Senator. Instead of receiving her account with the pleasure which might naturally have been expected, Crane listened with sombre eyes and a face which grew pale and paler. His chagrin could not be concealed, and Annette was quickly convinced, to her distress and amazement, that Senator Bicknell's visit was anything but pleasant to Crane.

When this was borne in upon her she stopped speaking and involuntarily fixed her clear, accusing eyes on her husband. All at once her suspicions of the changed relations between Crane and Senator Bicknell, and Crane and Governor Sanders, became a certainty. In a moment of inspiration—the inspiration of an intelligent honesty—the probable state of affairs flashed upon her. Crane's countenance grew anxious as Annette watched him.

"Did the Senator say he had got my letter?" he asked.

"He expressly said he had not heard from you," replied Annette. "Did you go away to avoid the Senator?"

It was but a chance shot, but it hit the bull's-eye. Crane did not answer the question, but got up and walked to the other end of the garden.

She could not, of course, know the details, but she knew, then, that Crane was a traitor, and was pretending a good will which he was far from feeling. Annette suffered as only a high-minded woman can suffer when the lower man in one she loves reveals itself. But she said nothing. She knew that Crane must work out his own salvation, and that she could be of no help to him there.

And Crane, having a guilty conscience, knew that Annette suspected the game he was playing—and this made him more unhappy but not less guilty than before.

Annette had told Crane of Constance Maitland's invitation to them, which piqued as much as it gratified him. He knew quite well that but for Annette he would have had no invitation. Later came a note from Constance repeating the invitation very cordially, but Annette felt obliged to decline it with all the thanks in the world.

So the summer passed for those two.

As for Thorndyke, his visit at Malvern Court lasted a week. It was a week of heaven and hell to him. When he went away Constance Maitland realized that to accomplish her heart's desire she would have to do the proposing herself, as Queen Victoria did on a similar occasion.

OF 7% INTEREST TO YOU

Substantial Investments that pay seven per cent. are not numerous.

It is double the ordinary bank rate of interest. Most shrewd investors are glad to get 5 per cent. and know that their money is safe. We are offering for public subscription a stock bearing 7 per cent. interest per annum, and an investment as reliable, we believe, as any bank in the country.

A limited amount of the 7 per cent. First Lien Preferred Stock of the

is offered for public subscription, subject to prior sale. Preferred as to assets, cumulative as to dividends.

Selling at par, $100. a share

Magnolia Anti-Friction Metal is famous the world over, and is used as a lining for machinery bearings of all kinds. Leading manufacturers in all parts of the country have stated, over their signatures, that Magnolia Metal is far superior to higher-priced babbitts.

A recent report of William Leslie & Co., chartered accountants, shows that the Company has earned during the past five years

An Average Annual Net Profit of Over $40,000

The present issue of Preferred Stock is for the purpose of increasing the working capital to enable the Company to keep up with the tremendous demand for its products.

The requirements of the New York Stock Exchange have been complied with in the preparation of the stock, and application will be made for listing on the Stock Exchange after the $200,000 seven per cent. first lien Preferred Stock has been allotted.

If you have money to invest, write for full particulars, including separate and special agreement, and for chartered accountants' report and prospectus.

Money Earning This Summer

ANY SATURDAY EVENING POST READER CAN HAVE A SHARE

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST is so pleased with the results of the offer by which a large sum of prize money was recently awarded to its agents that another series has now been arranged for the summer months. Under this plan

$3700 IN CASH

Will be divided among those persons who are willing to do a little pleasant work in leisure hours this summer. The offer is so arranged that any person willing to devote even a day or so to the work will receive a part of the money offered.

The prize money is not really in payment for work done but simply an extra incentive to good work. Every bit of work done, whether it be much or little, will be paid for with a liberal commission, but if you send eight subscriptions (these can be readily obtained with very little effort) you will in addition receive a part of the extra prize money.

Our agents will be authorized to make a special offer to their customers this summer which will be of assistance in getting business.

If you are interested, send a line addressed to The Saturday Evening Post Circulation Bureau,

Ralston

PURINA FOODS

Introducing the Ralston Purina Miller—a good, wholesome fellow, who makes all the good things in checkerboard packages, at the Big Mill, "where purity is paramount." SAYS THE MILLER:

"When you grow older, you will probably hear about 'proteids' and 'starches' and other funny things—but all you've got to remember is this: Food is like clothes; there's food for warm days and food for cold days and you need both kinds, same as clothes. Oats is an overcoat food and Ralston Health Oats is mighty good on cool mornings. Wheat is the all-year-around food—that's why you don't get tired of Ralston Breakfast Food. Whenever I see a field of wheat wavin' in the breeze and think of the millions of folk eating Ralston Breakfast Food and whole wheat bread made out of Purina Health Flour, it makes me feel I haven't lived for nothing.

Just be sure that what you eat is pure and that it tastes good, and be cheerful. The folk who go to their meals as if they were goin' to the doctor—will go to the doctor."

TELLS all about how to keep your floors in perfect condition. If you have hardwood floors, intend finishing old pine floors or laying new floors, this book is worth fully $25.00 to you. The result of our twenty years' experience in manufacturing fine hardwood floors is given in this book. Facts and pointers are brought out regarding your floors and their care that you did not know existed. You'll be pleasantly surprised at the unique suggestions.

Space is devoted to the various kinds of woods, showing why a certain wood is better for the kitchen floor than for the hall or chamber.

Then the proper way to finish new oak, ash, birch, maple and pine floors is carefully given. This book shows how to refinish old floors. If you have a floor finished in shellac or varnish and want to use wax on it instead, you can do it by consulting the above book.

We tell you how to care for a dancing floor, too. Why almost everything relating to floors is treated in our book, "The Proper Treatment for Hardwood Floors." Remember this book does not cost you one cent. We send it free to anyone who writes for it. Do not forget—write us now.

Americans of To-Day and To-Morrow—By Albert J. Beveridge

WE ARE concerned with the large characteristics of national being. The little prudences and wisdoms of individual life and character the individual will work out from his own experience and the councils of the wise. But all these will finally converge upon the few great standards of communal character. These must be elemental—can only be elemental; for the community is very much akin to nature—is indeed a manifestation of nature like oceans or stars or plants or animals. In the ceaseless flow of the Gulf Stream the unaccountable drops of water may each bear some different ingredient of matter, yet all are impelled in the same direction. So in our national life the individual with all of his peculiarities must conform to the general tendency of the mass to which he belongs. And what we are now engaged in is finding our natural course—making a survey of those fundamental elements of national character which grow out of the American People themselves—of their quantity and quality of power, their position for the using of that power.

We are not moralizing; we are analyzing.

There is no teacher of the fundamentals like Nature. And we are discovering here a kinship between Nature and peoples and nations. Think deep enough and you will find in Nature and the Nation not alone a similarity, but more: you will find a oneness, a unity. They have the same rhythmic on-going; the same convulsions, cataclysms and hurricanes; the same periods of peace, generation and fruitage—the same everything. Therefore the cosmic lessons of Nature should be the decalogue of national living and doing.

About the first thing we observe in the material universe is thoroughness. Nature has the severe morality of the artist. She is not content to leave the picture unfinished. Like the true artist she must work it out to the smallest detail, as in the case of the inspiring tale of the painter who starved and froze but finally finished his work to the last application of pigment no larger than a needle's point. If Nature wants a desert she produces Sahara. If she wants mountains she is not content until thousands of miles of them are heaped one upon the other in a very plethora of rugged perfection; and we have the Cordilleras or the Alps or the Himalayas.

There is in her thoroughness a regularity, too—she will repeat seasons of the same kind—Spring, Summer, Autumn and Winter—through countless ages in untiring iteration. And each season in itself is perfect. She will have no icicles in June; it is the time for roses and yellowing wheat. And she gets through her work while she is at it. No doubt that is why the great characters of history have been so often likened to Nature—they did their work down to the final stroke with a splendid disregard of everything but the completion of their task. And so we find the deeds of Cæsar or Napoleon or the words of Milton or Goethe compared to the movement of stars or the perfection of fury the tempest displays.

Put tongues to the trees, rivers and plains of our continental Republic and the word of power which all would utter in unison to the American People would be "Thoroughness." The fertile alluvium of the Mississippi Valley cries out to the millions to whom its productivity yields life: "Be not in haste; the master hand that made me for you was infinitely leisurely and took æons for my preparation. For that master hand, like the hand of all mastery, was thorough." We dare not go brawling through our time doing immeasurable things by piecemeal. Who cares for the reputation of a Coleridge? "What vast possibilities his fragments of work display!" cries the critic. But what have we to do with his "possibilities"? What matters "fragments" to us? We care not for power however bulky, nor for ideals however exalted unless they realize some finished performance. The heyday of Athens was less than a century; yet in that time of the ripeness and fruition of her effort she produced perfect work which does us good now and will do the race good as long as the race itself endures.

The defect of the present period of our American life is want of this very thoroughness. Perhaps it is natural that it should be so. America is the young man of the nations. And young manhood is not careful of completeness, finish and perfection of task. The young heart beats with the force of the reproductive time of life, and arterial blood flushes the brain with currents of action and enterprise impatient of the careful processes which thorough thinking and thorough doing require. And here comes an apparent paradox and conflict of the Natural and the Necessary. Our age and situation and all the ingredients of our being make us strong and therefore negligent of details. But by the same token, if permanent and beneficent results are to be wrought by our effort the firm hand of Thoroughness must hold in check our impetuosities.

The older peoples have learned this; and by doing thoroughly well their work with their comparatively inferior tools they are able to compete very respectably with us in commerce and industry and to surpass us in letters, art and philosophy. Yet with our youth and the imagination, ideality and daring thereof, with our coal in its beds, our iron in its mountains, and our fields ready with the fatness which they have stored up through their idle milleniums; with all the things with which the high gods of circumstance have endowed us, the efforts of other nations would afford no comparison, but only contrast, if we were to use our opportunity with thoroughness.

The enemy of thoroughness is Haste. And the parent of Haste is Immoderate Desire. And this in turn is a quality and defect of youth. Consider this in our civic life. We decide to build a monument. We establish commissions for it, appropriate money not generously but lavishly. Next year we say: "What! is the work not yet done?" When, as a matter of art, the constructive brain has not yet had time to conceive the design which we would have perfect and everlasting. Or, we are confronted with the economic development of industrial organization awkwardly called "trusts." They are good as a whole; but they display along with good certain evil. At the evil we cry out, and should. We ask for laws, and are furious if they are not produced instantly; as though the lawgiver can turn out statutes as the lumber-mill turns out shingles. When finally the law, under the pressure of public impatience and therefore full of imperfections, is produced, we expect results from it by the very process of printing it. It is a characteristic of our national life at the present time. Thoughtful men and, better still, the thoughtful masses—for we have "the thoughtful masses"—see that the day has already dawned when this neurotic haste with its crudity and partial performance must give place to the very opposite qualities.

England has been successful as an administrative government because she has doggedly clung to the British ideal of thoroughness. The satirists and poets are seldom wrong; and he who pictured British character as a bulldog was accurate. But her bulldog tenacity is the tenacity of a purpose not to be loosened till its work is utterly done. So, the British people in their time, which now appears growing to a close, have wrought well and carefully; and this notwithstanding the fact that the British mind for the last hundred years has shown a singular atrophy of the inventive faculty, a sort of sterility of resourcefulness.

We Americans on the contrary are luxuriant in expedients. We produce devices to meet a given situation with a readiness akin to that with which tropical soil shoots forth vegetation. We, too, have, in the sweep of that divine purpose which directs the destinies of peoples, become an administering power. With our wonderful adaptability, our fertility of thought and our moral elevation we shall undoubtedly produce an administrative system for our new possessions as much in advance of anything the world has seen as the telegraph of our Morse or the electric light of our Edison is beyond the slow processes of communication and dull methods of lighting of other peoples and older times. That is to say, we shall do this unless our impatience spoils the thoroughness of our execution. That is the crux of all of our difficulties. It is the explosive point of the Prince Rupert's drop of our destiny.

The Philippines would give us comparatively little trouble—on the other hand would yield an increasing harvest of material reward and of national satisfaction at righteous deeds done—if we would not deny Time a partnership in our effort. If we would be content to make our work thorough (realizing that thoroughness involves the regeneration, moral, mental and physical, of a people—the introduction of new methods, the planting of new ideals, and therefore requires patience) the problem would become plain and the labor easy. The companion of the Thorough is the Gradual. How unreasonable to expect instantaneous results in world-work! We clamor for returns at the national counting-house and for the metamorphosis of Malay barbarism into New England civilization in a shorter time than it took our pioneers to clear a field and raise a profitable crop.

Also, we are competitors of England and Germany in the world's markets. If we are wise enough to add England's former and Germany's present Thoroughness in industry and method, the world of commerce and trade is literally ours. If we make Thoroughness the superintendent of our industry the Republic will be the commercial hegemon of all countries and all peoples.

Go to see the performance of excellent acrobats whenever you can. There is in their work far more than diversion; there is instruction which amounts to a stimulus. Observe the perfect calculation of distance, the sure, quick grasp of hand, the exact computation of time, and, through all, the hazard of it, the grace and ease of the flying bird. And consider, you who observe, that their art is a trivial one—the lowest form of amusement. Yet, reflect on the infinite pains they take for the sake of perfection. They could not perform the simplest of their complicated feats did they not practice daily—did they not bend the whole energies of their life to thoroughness. Yet, you who are a lawyer, or you who are a writer, or you who are a man of affairs, or still you other who are a statesman or should be—all your occupations are large and worth while compared with the profession of the poor acrobat. But do any of us reach the acrobat's perfection? If we do not, he is a better man than we. He plays his part—plays it thoroughly. We dissipate our energies. We do as much as we must and no more. Said a writer of great present popularity on this very theme: "How long do I labor over my pages? Not long, for the publisher is eager for them. And they will sell as well to-day or better than if I put unlimited care to their revision." But he was wrong there. Gibbon rewrote the first few chapters of his Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire fifteen or sixteen times; and the ancients spent a lifetime on what would now fill a single volume. I will tell you, my friend, our national need is Thoroughness. It is my need of needs and yours too, doubt not. The acrobats bring it home to us with humiliating emphasis. So do sharp-shooters and all other performers of the arts of inferior diversion. Observe the vaudeville marksman shoot through a finger ring held by an assistant, and reflect that it took years of practice and scores of thousands of shots to acquire the skill which has no use but to amuse us.

In Canton, China, you may see a workman with a bent steel tool and a lathe turning a block of ivory into a ball. Without breaking this ball he hollows out a space until within the first cover is another ball; and this he hollows out and continues the process until perhaps twenty balls are each within the unbroken sphere of the other. These spheres he perforates with little stars and flowers. He has, at the end of indescribable toil, produced nothing better than a beautiful curiosity, you will say. Yes, he has produced perfection; and no perfection can be called trivial. You go away from the patient workman with your arrogance humbled.

How is it that Thoroughness is the necessity of our present national condition any more than it was yesterday or the day before? Let us answer this by taking commerce as an illustration. Until yesterday we were a developing people. We were engaged in the movement of communities within ourselves—planting new states, constructing railroads, building cities, locating and opening mines. We were "finding ourselves." And though that process is not yet completed, it is so far completed that we are matured and are in direct competition with other mature people. Well! we cannot sell our articles unless they are better made and cheaper than the articles produced by other peoples. All this means not ingenuity only, which is to-day our best commercial traveler, but also thoroughness in the making and finishing of our merchandise.

Or answer it by art and letters. Heretofore, a writer has seen a demand for a book. "The demand may cease," says the frugal man of the pen. "I will hasten my sheets to the printer." But this commercialism of letters is passing. Writers are finding out that their Aladdin reputations which yield profit and the vainglory of notoriety wither overnight. And the money greed which made them hasten to write "the book of the hour" is already succumbing to their instinct of immortality which commands them to write the book of the decade—the century. They are beginning to seize upon the lasting things of nature and life. The modern scientific method is helping this; and that spirit which is so stern a tyrant in the laboratory is spreading among the American masses. The American fireside is growing to be a tribunal of criticism. Note how impatiently a political sophistry is dismissed; how quickly the family circle rejects an untruth; with what contempt a slattern piece of work is cast aside. The magazine publisher recognizes this. He pays impossible prices for the most careful productions. Ask him why, and he will answer: "Because the American public demands the best. Articles equally interesting but not equally veracious or equally thorough can be had at a small fraction of the cost of our best material; but, you see, the circulation immediately drops. The instinct of the reading public is unerring and knows without analysis the perfect work from the imperfect and demands it—will have it."

The time is ripe for the American Leckys, Mommsens, Spencers. The present century will produce the American Goethe and Balzac—we dare not say the American Shakespeare; for, like the Bible, Shakespeare seems to be the interpretation of the present and future as well as the past.

"You Americans may give subsidies to your ships, but we will still hold our supremacy in the passenger service of the seas," said the president of one of the great German steamship lines. "We will do this in spite of your subsidies, in spite of your undeniable gifts in construction and all enterprise, merely because you have not the gift of thoroughness; and we Germans have. We will save enough in our selection of provisions; we will win enough in alluring passengers by the quality of our wine and food to offset the artificial help of your Government. For example: Although I am president of this company, I personally select our wines; I personally examine the quality of our companies doing the like." I say not that this German commercial king of the ocean spoke truly. I merely cite his statements. One thing is beyond all question, however—German maritime supremacy is built on the keel of German Thoroughness. Please reflect that the German flag has become one of the dominant ensigns of the oceans only within the last fifteen years—no time at all. But then, you see, the German ship lines in partnership with the German Imperial Government maintain a corps of students of the craft of shipbuilding. They have become the nicest calculators of the condensation of power, the enlargement of space in the construction of vessels, the adaptation of size and strength to capacity and speed the world has ever seen.

Yet Germany has only a window on the sea, while to the American Republic the oceans are our encircling verandas. As pointed out in the first of these papers, it is impossible that America shall not become the first sea power of the world and remain so. That is the verdict of our coast lines, our harbors, the currents of the deep, the trade winds and the globe's continents and islands. There is no appeal from the verdict of that jury of geography. Yet, it will be no undisputed mastery unless Thoroughness is made the admiral of our fleets.

Republican government is so superior to any other form of management of organized society that it detracts not from the excellence of our institutions to mention some of the drawbacks. Perhaps the most distinguished benefit which our popular government confers on the citizen is unlimited opportunity. Yet unlimited opportunity means unlimited rivalry; and this means a haste of achievement which becomes forgetful of substantial results. So we have the craze of getting rich quick; and some fear that this may become a permanent insanity. One man makes a great deal of money; immediately everybody else wants to make as much or more. From this Crœsus ambition of getting large wealth comes the desire to get it as quickly as possible. And this means the neglect of the solid and substantial, the ignoring of that which will be really beneficial next year as well as this year.

To all this a halt must be called. The national disease of million-mania must be checked and finally eradicated. But like all social and industrial evils the disease is curing itself. So many men have piled up so many millions that large wealth is becoming common—almost vulgar. Therefore the minds of those who got rich yesterday are already turning away from the dreary emptiness which sheer wealth affords to that fullness of life and real richness of reward which comes of doing something lasting and valuable for human society.

Also, the complicated nature of modern business demands the highest order of constructive talent in the management of our enormous modern investments. We are developing, instead of the old-time "financier," real statesmen of business. The newly-rich from fortunate adventure, mere chance or lucky speculation wait like messenger boys the command of the real generals of industry and commerce. And these latter have, for their lieutenants, Conserving Mind, Believing Heart and Thorough Method.

The general superintendent of one of the Middle Western railway systems, who started in as a freight handler at a dollar a day and now governs ten thousand men, said: "We must have an assistant superintendent. We have been looking for one for a year. The road has in its employ half a dozen sons of multi-millionaires whose fathers would do anything to get them the place. I cannot consent that any of them shall have it. Highly educated as they are, wealthy and influential as they are, not a man of them is thorough and persistent. We cannot intrust the machinery of our immense organization of traffic to incompetent hands. The dividends of our stockholders are at stake; and the lives of our hundreds of thousands of passengers are a factor in the selection of my assistant. We are searching the country for the man who has the ability, the health, the habits, and above all the thoroughness which this situation absolutely demands."

This is an instance which any person widely acquainted can duplicate by the hundred. And so, in spite of the haste which the opportunity and rivalry fostered by our democratic institutions create, the very structure of our social and industrial organization requires not even integrity more than it requires thoroughness. Your great newspaper, your great railroad, your great industrial corporation would fall to pieces without it, as masses of matter would dissolve into dust were it not for the mysterious force that we call cohesion. Thus we see that out of our national situation, out of the very elements of our present state of development, out of our individual needs as members of our continental community, Thoroughness is called for not as a matter of prudence or advisability, but as a matter of absolute necessity.

On Thoroughness hereafter our statesmanship must rest—no ill-considered laws, no rash policies for the American People.

On Thoroughness our diplomacy must rest—no brilliant play for present position, but each piece of American diplomacy comprehending the centuries.

On Thoroughness our industrial development must rest—no schemes which may dazzle for a decade and then break up because they are not carefully connected with the growth of the age.

On Thoroughness American literature must rest—no flashing comet of literary genius making the world gasp for the moment, but, instead, fixed stars that shine forever like the classics of the past.

Thoroughness, Thoroughness and yet again Thoroughness, from the tying of your shoestring to the solving of the Nation's highest problems!. It is the talismanic American word of the twentieth century.

Editor's Note—This is the fourth of Senator Beveridge's papers on Americans of To-day and To-morrow.

The Hanky Panky Yankee

By Frank M. Bicknell

(A Suggestion for an English Music-Hall Ditty)

The bogeyman is loose upon this right, tight little isle,
He came across the ocean and he'll stay here quite a while;
A right smart Yankee from the States, he's full of pluck and brains,
And every time he shakes his purse the money simply rains.
He is a howling terror, he's a blasted bugaboo,
He buys things we don't want to sell, and sells things that we do;
He flings the oof about so free, unless we're on our guard
He'll carry off the birthplace of our own Immortal Bard;
Just anything he wants he takes, his cash he doesn't spare,
For he's a multi-million-, he's a blooming billionaire,—
This cranky, lanky, hanky-panky Y-a-n-kee!

He sells us wheat, he sells us meat, he sells us shoes to wear,
He sells us locomotives, his machines are everywhere,
He sends his prints to Manchester, to Sheffield sends his knives;
He undersells us every time, his business always thrives,
And when he isn't selling, to amuse himself he buys,
He buys things we should like to keep, things we most dearly prize:
Old masters, first editions, treasures rich and treasures rare,
Ancestral plate or acres, or heirloom from bankrupt heir,—
This Yank has coin to fill a bank, for cost he doesn't care,
For he's a multi-million-, he's a blooming billionaire,—
This cranky, lanky, hanky-panky Y-a-n-kee!

One day he buys a tram franchise, the next a steamship line,
There's naught too big for him to buy, his pocket is a mine;
He came and bought our Jumbo, he's bought old Jingo, too,
The wonder is he doesn't buy the whole blame' blessed Zoo;
He buys our ducal castles and no one dares rebuke,
And if his daughter asks him he will even buy a duke.
By'n'by he'll buy the House of Lords, likewise King Edward's crown,
Then form a little syndicate and buy old London Town.
Just anything he wants he takes, his cash he doesn't spare,
For he's a multi-million-, he's a blooming billionaire,—
This cranky, lanky, hanky-panky Y-a-n-kee!

Where the Jewels Come From, Who Wears Them, Who Buys Them or Only Rents Them

By David Graham Phillips

IF YOU wished fully to realize New York's present passion for luxury you could do so by taking a cab at seven in the evening and spending the succeeding six hours in glancing at the crowds in the streets and the first-class restaurants and theatres. You would have no time for a long pause at any one place; you would be in and out of your cab every moment or so; you would only cover a district less than a mile long, less than a quarter of a mile wide. Yet you would have seen about fifty thousand men and women with all the outward signs of great prosperity and evidently spending a good round sum for the single evening's enjoyment. Nobody gets anything for nothing anywhere in New York. You would have seen but a very small part of the population of New York that can, but a small part even of the population that does, spend money freely in more or less extravagant ways. But you would have got an overwhelming impression of luxury, of pleasure-hunting by droves of prosperous people, of extravagant dress, of jewels.

New Yorkers are always asking each other these two questions:

Where do all these people get all this money they "blow in" so freely?

Where do all these women get all those jewels?

As was suggested in the previous article, the most fashionable women of New York, those that have the half million and million dollar collections of jewels, do not as a rule at present wear in public places the great quantities of gems one might expect in view of what they could wear if they chose. But the less fashionable of the women who have the Croesus-like collections of ropes, collars, breastplates, stomachers, crowns, sprays, rings, earrings, combs, pins, buckles, clasps, fans and vinaigrettes, put it all on whenever they have a chance—and they often make the chance. Then there are the actresses, real and reputed, several hundred of them, all very much in evidence almost every day, who have prudently put by their earnings and their savings and the results of speculations on friendly tips by admiring stockbrokers. Naturally they put by in the, for them, most satisfactory form—jewelry. For jewels can be displayed and are therefore most useful in "making a front"; also, they can be pawned in stormy weather, sold quickly for cash in time of calamity. Finally, there is the great mass of young or youngish women, wives or sisters or dependents of more or less prosperous men—the women who "put it all on their backs." They come, evening, afternoon, morning as well, loaded with jewelry—diamond or emerald or sapphire pins in their hats; not one, but several, each worth from $500 to $1000; pendants, chains, jeweled purses, rings, these last weighting the fingers of both carefully-manicured, obviously idle hands. They glitter and flash as they drive in the Park or the Avenue, as they wander about the fashionable shops, as they wave their hands and toss their heads and twist their bodies in advantageous, but of course purely accidental, animation.

The Gem Dealers' Customers

THE evening's tour of the New York world of so-called pleasure would leave upon the mind, vividest of all impressions of luxury and ostentation, the impression of jewelry. In the first-class public resorts you will see few women who are not wearing at least three or four thousand dollars' worth; and you will see scores, many scores, wearing from twenty to fifty thousand dollars' worth; and you will see an amazing number with a hundred thousand dollars' worth or more. Women everybody knows, wives of men noted throughout the country for wealth? Not at all. Women who are not known outside a limited circle; women whose masculine sources of income, proper or peculiar, would not be known by name to any considerable part of New York's population. It must be remembered that there are more than four thousand millionaires and almost-millionaires on Manhattan Island, besides the visiting rich people and the resident prosperous workingmen with incomes of upward of thirty thousand a year.

There are five big jewelry shops in New York; there are a dozen at least, in addition, that would have been considered very big twenty years ago; and the department stores carry enormous stocks of jewels, including the finest.

Everything is jeweled nowadays—simplicity means moderation in bejeweling, not absence of it. Would you give a fine dinner or a pretentious dance? There must be jeweled favors. Would you give a wedding present? Something, anything, with jewels on it has the preference—not cheap jewels, but the precious or semi-precious that raise the cost of an article from a few dollars to a hundred at least, and more often to five hundred, a thousand, several thousand. Hat-pins must be jeweled—a thousand dollars for a hat-pin is not at all rare. Cigarette cases, whether for men or for women, must be jeweled. So must every trifling article for a woman's dressing-table—and many articles for a man's.

The most fashionable and the least fashionable men in New York are still rather shy of adorning themselves with jewelry. But in between is a multitude, from bar-tenders and touts and roulette-wheel turners and financial mysteries to suddenly successful young and old business men, who go in for jeweled cuff-links, jeweled shirt buttons and waistcoat buttons, for rings and begemmed card-cases, pocketbooks, pocket-knives, pencils, and the like. A man who prides himself on simplicity will wear a pin that cost from $1000 to $10,000, will have other simple trifles jeweled to the extent of four or five thousand more. But the most ostentatious men are far, far behind the "quiet" and "simple" women. Parasol handles, fans and the like must have gems. The purse must be gold with diamonds along the upper edge and pearl pendants. And other articles which could not well be decorated with precious stones are studded with amethysts, white sapphires, peridots—at prices that would have staggered the richest American of a generation ago.

Miss Simplicity's Burden of Jewels

"I DETEST jewelry," said a New York woman not long ago. "It is so vulgar. I wear almost nothing nowadays."

And at first glance she did seem to have "almost nothing" in the way of jewelry in sight. But at second glance:

Two hat-pins, not less than	$ 2,400
A ruby surrounded by diamonds in a brooch,	20,000
A string of black pearls,	175,000
Three rings—a solitaire diamond, a black pearl, a white pearl,	32,000
Only seven articles, none conspicuous, yet in the total costing	$229,400

In the Moorish room at the Waldorf-Astoria the other afternoon sat three women, not conspicuously dressed. They had in view, taking them all, no less than ninety-four pieces of jewelry. The total value would doubtless show modestly beside the total of the one woman with "almost nothing"; but it would be a sum which, put out at interest, would bring an income five or six times that of the average preacher, school teacher or lawyer in a small town. The first impression of any of these New York jewel displays, dazzling though it is to the material imagination, is feeble in comparison with the showing on analysis. You can't buy much of a ring, as rings go nowadays, for less than a thousand dollars. And you can scatter ten thousand dollars without getting together enough to make a gamin take a second glance.

A stranger in New York might fancy that all of this bejeweled ostentation represented solid prosperity. The reverse is the case. There is no question as to the solid backing of the bejeweled wives and daughters of the real millionaires. But these aside, there is a vast deal of pitiful, contemptible sham. Like the handsome dresses, the handsome jewels represent—to omit moral conditions of a certain peculiarly offensive kind—a struggle after show at the expense of self-respect. People live in uncomfortable, sometimes even in squalid, places, live on the gas-stove, almost on the free-lunch plan, that the women of the family may stick on jewels. Tradesmen go unpaid, incomes are anticipated, the horrid spectre of financial ruin is admitted to lodging and to a share in the sleepless bed that the wife may cut a dash with her gems in Sherry's of a Sunday night. Nor is the husband behind the wife in the enthusiasm for this the most impressive kind of show. The wife is the family signal of prosperity to the outside world. Does the husband wish, by displaying a less gorgeous signal, to confess that he is less competent, less successful than other men of about his kind?

Two canons of the tooth-and-claw law of the tooth-and-claw section of New York's population are:

Be rich, if possible.

If not, seem to be rich at any cost.

But in addition to the bejeweled women who have at least some sort of a backing, shadowy and slippery though it may be, there are in still larger numbers the bejeweled women who have no sort of backing. How do these get their bedeckings of diamonds and sapphires and semi-precious stones that enable them to seem equally rich and equally extravagant with their sisters of the securely enthroned plutocracy?

On the "installment plan." In many parts of the city—notably in Broadway—there are jewelers who will in effect rent large quantities of jewels to any woman who can satisfy them that she can pay the rent and is not likely to run away.

"Certainly, lady," said a Broadway renting-jeweler to the wife of a young lawyer, "take this $20,000 necklace and the $10,000 worth of rings right along with you. Pay what you can from week to week and I'll credit it on the bill. Oh, no—we never send bills to our lady customers. We understand about those little domestic difficulties. You can tell him they are paste. Oh, you'll be surprised how soon you will have paid for them—part of them, at least. And then——"

The Installment Plan of Looking Wealthy

HE ENDED with a subtle, smiling hint that would have been a dose of the most insidious moral poison to a weak mind. This is an instance in what has become an enormous traffic. The cook, the watchman's wife, the floorwalker's daughter—they are buying a ring or a pin or a string of dubious-looking pearls on the installment plan. They are skimping to pay, and casting restlessly about. This way lie all manner of teasings to turpitude, of incitements to speculation.

The chief charm of jewels—no, let us not forget that such vulgarities as price have nothing to do with the charm of jewels—one of the alleged charms of jewels is that they give the wearer the same air of substantiality that he or she would have could he or she go forth displaying a certified check for a large amount, or a bundle of first mortgage bonds. People say: "Well, —— has ten thousand dollars, anyhow. Look at those jewels; they'd sell for that. And when the worst comes to the worst they can easily be secreted from the bankruptcy wreck." But now, alas! this, too, has passed away. The jewels may be installment-plan purchases—mere rented prosperity representing not substantiality and achievement but debt and deception and degradation. That is another item in the explanation why a New Yorker is on the one hand greedily credulous of stories of wealth and on the other hand cynically suspicious of the reality of any apparent prosperity, however plausible. Further, New York knows that there is a certain kind of New Yorker who appreciates that a moderate prosperity can be made to seem huge by spreading it out thin—for example, the woman who could afford to buy $10,000 worth of jewelry can afford to carry, on the installment plan and in vague hope of a windfall, $50,000 worth or more.

With these facts well in mind, a student of the great New York show finds a fascinating if melancholy or cynical interest in the throngs that pack theatres and restaurants in the evening and that press upon the jewel counters all day long. And in the splendid flashings of these myriad precious stones he catches many a baleful gleam—and many a malicious twinkle.

Editor's Note—This is the second of Mr. David Graham Phillips' two papers on this subject.

RUSTICATED

"YOU should have seen the dean dance," said the druggist's clerk, "as I cauterized his hindquarters, and took some stitches in them, but 'twas awful thoughtless of your bull pup."

"Well, anyhow, Wilson, they've rusticated me for two years—it came too soon upon the trouble about the goose. I'll try Cork this time; luckily there's no residence at the Queen's."

"Luckily?"

I got to Cork of an afternoon and put up at the Victoria Hotel till I could find lodgings. Next morning I was late to breakfast, with a slight suggestion of headache, but found time to enter at college, send for a tailor, have my hair curled. A week in town, and no rooms yet, at hotel still, paid bill, one crown piece left, must have rooms. So I started out briskly and first for the college. Letter awaiting me:

My darling Robert:

Not hearing from you, we suppose you are reading hard. Papa says it is time you turned over a new leaf. He had a bill yesterday from a Dublin veterinary for trimming the ears and tail of that bulldog you made such trouble with in Trinity. The junior dean also wrote saying that your two years' term of rustication might be shortened by a twelvemonth should they hear of your doing well in Cork. Now we all want you to return to T. C. D. I am sending you a hamper prepaid to the Cork station awaiting your order. Always see that your linen is well aired on return from the laundry. Should you cough put a mustard leaf on your chest and take a glass of Amontillado with a little glycerine and—well—send for Doctor Townsend. Don't walk on the grass before ten o'clock, so as to avoid the dew. You should change to woolen socks in about a fortnight from this. Be sensible, but don't work too hard, as you are still growing. I inclose a note from your sister.

Your loving mother,

DOROTHY HAMILTON.

Inclosure:

Dear Bobby:

I do so hope you are well. There is nothing new and yet it seems an age since you were here. I had a note from Grace Rivers this morning. Her brother Tom wrote her that you could hear a pin drop in Trinity since you were sent down. Papa had the strangest and funniest letter, delicately scented, in a pretty foreign hand, from some Mademoiselle Yvonne de Château Demoli—what an extraordinary name—calling him her "petit méchant," her "bien aimé Bobee," saying that she was "désolée" by his absence, and imploring his return. 'Twas written from the Theatre Royal. We didn't see the letter to read its further contents. It made Uncle William laugh a good deal. "Wrong address," said he. If you happen to pass MacSweeney, Delaney's—and take care you do so on receipt—I wish you would buy me a curling-tongs and one dozen leather curlers; also three pounds No. 12 lamb's wool for creweling. I inclose the money as usual. Now, Puggsy, don't go at once and buy a new set of boxing-gloves or a meerschaum with my money, and then talk to me about the silliness of girls. Write regularly. Your loving sister,

PATIENCE.

P. S. When you want pocket-money in a hurry write to Momsey or me on general topics, and don't stamp the envelope. Send the curling-tongs at the very least. Now! do: you know I must have one. I look a fright near Grace Rivers. If I were only a man, Bob—but the best of you are horrid, coarse things; now, really, isn't that so?—I could snuggle up near Gracie and look at her for hours. She doesn't seem to talk to me—she purrs. Some day I, too, may find a sweetheart as nice as Gracie's. Do you think I could? I saw in the English Gentlewoman that Rowland's Macassar Oil "imparts brilliancy and pliability to the hair and beard." If you send me all I have written for I shall send you a bottle. You love Gracie, don't you, Puggsy?—tell me honest.

P.

Nothing could be further from my inclinations than a personal hunt for rooms. I never got quite accustomed to it, though the unpleasantness was perhaps more felt at first. Happily a fellow-student whom I made my confidant spoke to me of a house on the Mardyke, such as he thought might suit me, and on which that morning he saw an "Apartment to Let" notice. There would have been no trouble had I been disposed to live in the "diggings" of the average student, but I had a horror of dowdy landladies in faded finery and hair in curl-papers, of stuffy rooms and rickety furniture. This was such a street as prosperous tradesmen might occupy, or half-pay officers. As a matter of fact, Her Majesty's judges on circuit lodged there. Well, I set out. And sure enough there was the house, in perfect condition, new and evidently well kept.

What would inspection reveal of the inside?

My ring brought to the door, on the instant, a prim little man of middle age wearing goggles. This was the owner, Mr. Brownson. He was delicate of build, with straggling fawn-colored hair and whiskers, white and red complexion, blue veins and blue eyes. Altogether a dapper little person.

Behind him was a yet more dapper little wife, his counterpart save as to the whiskers. A momentary smile, whether of surprise or welcome, corrugated the skin in transverse wrinkles over a peaky little nose. In front of her ears hung down on either side a nice little hand-made curl such as ladies of quality loved in the days of our grandmothers. Behind the little wife, in a cunning little baby carriage, was the cutest little infant, of some undetermined sex, all a-chirp and a-coo. Beside the baby carriage was a sturdy servant girl, nineteen or thereabouts, fresh from the country; the full of a door, she took a strong hold of the ground with her feet; was in shape a perfect cube.

"Good Lord," said I to myself.

They were evidently about to set out for a walk as I rang. I must confess my purpose made me bashful, if not shamefaced; it was ever thus. I told them what I wanted, and, quite so, the second floor was to let furnished. The husband asked me to step upstairs and have a look. Everything was of the pink of neatness.

"I shall gladly take the apartments."

"Wouldn't I like to know the terms?"

"Why, of course," as if I had forgotten, though, as a matter of fact, I hadn't the faintest notion of what they should cost, and, what's more, didn't care. The figures suited admirably. Might he inquire my business? A student. Oh! he was afraid—didn't altogether know—would like to consult his wife—you see students were so noisy, turbulent even.

Heavens! was this paradise to escape me? Was I Ulysses, or Æneas, or Christopher Columbus to set out afresh on such detestable travels in search of a home or what not?

"As a matter of fact, my dear sir," and I coughed gently, following up with a subdued sigh, "I have come here to escape just such unpleasant associations," and then again, I was reading law not medicine. (Note: Art students were the middle term.) He looked at me and into me. The latter somewhat bored me. He was hesitating—I was patient for I felt I had gained my cause. I was certainly good-looking, if not indeed distinguished, and that in the judgment of such critics as my mother and my father's sister, sweet Aunt Bessie. In dress and bearing I was a toned-down Count d'Orsay with the curls both natural and acquired of Alfred de Vigny. A word or two with his wife on our return and my lot was fixed agreeably. The family party set out, but the Cube was left to wait upon me and arrange my rooms. A passing street arab took a note to the baggage-master at the station; a second sought a cabman who returned in short order from the hotel with my luggage.

"That will pay you," and I gave him what was left of the crown piece after tipping the arabs. He smiled. "You're a king," said he. "Uncrowned," said I. "Thim's the best be far," said he with decision, just as if he had known both sorts intimately and had taken sides.

At length I sat down before a blazing fire, my troubles at an end, if my pockets were empty, for a letter or telegram would bring me money in the morning. What with a cup of well-made Mocha, a comfortable armchair and the cozy surroundings, faith, I needn't have called the Queen my aunt, and in troth I didn't, either. A gentle languor crept upon me, and I fell into a doze, to be awakened by a tapping at the door.

"Come on," said I, and in strode the Cube.

If I knew as much then as I did later I'd rather have seen Poe's Raven fluttering in.

"They's min at the door wid a hamper for you, sir."

"Send them up."

And after a moment in came the raw material of a cataclysm bearing the promised hamper. He laid it down in the corner which, as my back turned to the cataclysm, I had vaguely indicated by a hand motion. Now, I was invariably liberal in the matter of tips. Whatever some may say, it makes life easier, and that's a gain, but I hadn't a butcher's penny. And that's why I didn't turn round, but rather, when a heavy breathing and the drop on the floor showed that the Raw Material's work was done, said, with an affectation of thoughtless indifference:

"That will do, my man—please shut the door as you go."

"My man, indeed!"

"My catastrophe—my thoroughbred Vesuvius, if you please."

"Oh! I axes your pardon, sir—they's wan and sixpence due on the hamper."

"I'm afraid you're mistaken," I replied; "that hamper is prepaid."

"Oh! begor, sir, that's all right as far as up to the station goes, but I'm towld to collect the wan and sixpence for the transportation ov it from the station to the house."

This was a dreadful poser, though it served, however unpleasantly, to clear up the situation. But all this clearing up didn't bring one and sixpence into view. Many a time before and many a time since have I found myself in a tight place when quick thinking and action just pulled me through, and why, reflecting reader, tell me why, I didn't in this particular pass recall the innumerable hampers which a loving mother had at different times sent me, all warranted to contain, hidden away in some corner, at the very bottom, a sockful of silver and one-pound notes, National, Munster and Hibernian, the equivalent of a myriad one and sixpences. To-day when some fool cross-examiner or other callow psychologist asks me why or how I remember or fail to remember anything I think of the hamper. Be that as it may, my memory failed me just at the time I should have thought of the possibilities of the leprechawn stocking within the hamper.

"There's some mistake somewhere," I rejoined after a moment; "leave the hamper and go—I'll call at the station later, and straighten out matters."

"The divil a bit," roared the Raw Material—he must have thought I brought his word in question—"no wan and sixpence, no hamper—them's my orders."

It doesn't take much to start a fight in Ireland—thank the Lord for all His mercies—no well-regulated mind but keeps well stocked with such excuses, and here was one to justify an Armageddon.

"I've told you what to do," said I in measured tones, with an unconscious stiffening of the jaws; "now go."

"Arrah be aisy, me little buggawn—won't you let me stay till you've finished your tay? What kind ov a cantankerous cocksparra did ye have for a wet nurse that makes ye so bowld wid yer betters?"

He went through the door, and only 'twas open he'd have carried it with him.

The staircase opened on the landing just outside the door, and down the stairs he went, not making two bites of a cherry, or of the one blow. I was too quick for him, and then again, as I reached the angle of his jaw he tripped on the corner of the hamper. I closed the door. Talk of "chorus hymeneal or triumphal chant!" There wasn't a single blood corpuscle in my body but was playing the organ as I went to the window to see the van men drive away.

Drive away indeed! If so they meant they were taking the wrong road, for my eyes fell upon them leaving the van and making for the hall door, one with a whip in hand, the other with a horse trace. No time was to be lost, so I quickly took the advice of a veteran blackthorn stick which stood expectantly by the mantelpiece, and awaited the invaders at the head of the stairs. You could break the ten Commandments with that same blackthorn, not to talk of a man's head. Murder Macquire—his real Christian name was Murtagh—a grandfather's tenant of mine, was the original owner. Some day I'll write down the story. Well, I was awaiting the invaders—the job was an easy one. They were on time, but I was on top, and the odds were even. The narrowness of the battlefield soon forced us to fall back on our fists for want of room to ply our weapons. After a few minutes of joyous and delirious effort I was downed by a punch over the destined repository for my angelic mother's Amontillado and glycerine, the enemy occupying temporarily a recumbent position on the top of me.

I have suggested that the street was an eminently quiet one, and so it was to the extent that any disturbance ever found therein was invariably of exoteric, never of esoteric, origin. But its normal placidity of bearing was conditioned by the fact that twice daily it was a highway for students on the way to college, whilst at uncertain intervals boys of the town found it a short cut to their football grounds which lay beyond. As usual, no love was lost between these types and so——

Great Heavens! what cyclonic roaring is this now, and what trampling thousands? My brain was in a whirl; this must be an earthquake or a foretaste of Heaven. Blücher at Quatre-Bras couldn't hold a candle to it. In an instant I was on my feet, haled up, punched up, held up, and around me a wild swarm of combatants. Troops of students—Jove, where did they all come from?—legions of town loafers yelling and struggling and puffing—the original invaders had left the hall door open, hence the deluge. The students were headed by two demi-gods: a cousin of mine, Berkeley Russell, remarkable for a cast in the eye and an awful temper, and Tim Neville, whose game leg was compensated for by the arms of a blacksmith and the ferocity of an Apache. The loafers had no head, but hands that were moulded for manslaughter. The real business of the day began. Crowds gathering on the outside blocked the street and swarmed into the house. Everybody couldn't join in the mêlée: the disappointed overflowed the building from attic to basement and began looting. The hungrier and wiser were regaling themselves with a hasty lunch in the kitchen. So much the worse for the quiet of the house. The Cube gave a piercing scream, and a section of the students ran down to investigate. Things were lively enough already, but the infernal din of clashing kettles and pans as the students and loafers were settling their troubles round the kitchen table, was, barring puns, a pandemonium. It was a toss up whether I or my antagonist for the moment would go head foremost over the bannister, when out from nowhere dashed the little white-and-red-faced landlord. 'Twas easy enough with anything at all like hindsight to recognize that his frantic rush toward me was an emphasized interrogation, nothing more.

"But how could I have known at the time?" said awful Berkeley afterward. And faith he couldn't, for he didn't do a thing but just lam the unlucky landlord—what are they made for, anyhow?—a prize-poem-beauty-on-the-jaw that sent him flying. He was awful reckless, was Berkeley, but very fond of me.

"Go sit down and weep, you infernal idiot," I roared, "you've cooked my goose," and I ran to pick up poor Brownson, who was momentarily reclining on his head, and apparently in deep thought—his latest experience had evidently impressed him with the beauty of repose. Meanwhile, the students from the kitchen had rejoined us and, with redoubled energy, we made one wild, swirling rush upon the enemy. The event demonstrated in the concrete the supreme value of a liberal education. The Latinists rode rough shod over the Vernaculars. Caius Julius Cæsar McGillicoddy surnamed "Femur"—from his blackthorn, which was the shape of a thigh bone—forced Vercingetorix MacNally, otherwise known as "Scrab" Nally, to swallow a section of his dental formula and suffer the fracture of some unoffending ribs. Marcus Furius Camillus O'Brien knocked the eternal stuffing out of Brennus O'Shaugnessy surnamed Brandy Punch. But why particularize? The decisive moment saw the unfortunate if blameless hamper flung over the bannister in an effort to crush the desperate last resistance of a small knot of the enemy, whose nucleus was the two van men. A few heads more were badly done up and the enemy finally routed, but the hamper gave way under the strain and the contents went to join the waste and ruin of our great upheaval. The war was now over and the hall door shut to.

Heavens! what a sight our wounded eyes fell upon. A seismologist might have felt at home. A Lurrighadhaun couldn't have found enough of the mirror over the mantelpiece to shave with. I didn't so much bother about the chair legs—for the fellows must have weapons to fight with, though the pictures on the wall, or rather the frames, might have been left alone—but Neville welted a coal porter with a "Noble Army of Martyrs" and the porter's side partner nearly broke Neville's jaw with Queen Victoria. Black eyes and bloody noses were in any event too commonplace to be worth an inventory, but when Berkeley's nose was driven in the same direction as the cast in the eye, I have seen much handsomer portrait painting on a tea-caddy. The dapper little landlady was alternating fits of swooning with fits of hysteric screaming, but the peaky little nose kept on doing a little corrugating giggle on its own account. The baby sucked its toe to the climax and the Cube sang O'Donnell Aboo. Breathless we assembled in my room, which was packed. Tim Neville moved the dreamy-eyed landlord into the chair. We drank his health in some fairylike whisky which was found in the pantry. "Gentlemen," said Brownson, "you must permit me to retire. I feel rather exhausted. I'll sleep well to-night, if I don't have a nightmare."

"More power to you," cried we all.

He looked for the moment as if meditating; said he, "I thought, Mr. Hamilton, you were a quiet young man."

"So I am," said I, "only I can't stand imposition."

"How so?" said he.

"Those ruffians wanted to overcharge me one and sixpence for bringing me the hamper," I explained.

"'Tis hard to understand the Irish," he groaned, and as we led him to the door he trod on a well-filled sock in the torn toe of which appeared one and sixpence.

I lived two years with him.

THE CHIEF ENGINEER

The Love Story of a Patient Man

BY LLOYD OSBOURNE

III

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS—When Florence Fenacre fell heir to her millions no one was more astonished than Florence herself. In the old New England seaport where she had always lived the only memory of her uncle had been that of deep-seated division between him and her father, and nobody could have supposed that the lonely old millionaire meant to make reparation in his will. Indeed it had been pretty well settled by the good gossips of the town that Florence was to marry Frank Rignold. Frank was the chief engineer of a cargo boat running to South American ports. He had no promise from Florence—rather had she discouraged him—but he felt that his whole-hearted devotion was making its impression, and his hopes were high with a lover's optimism—until the millions came.

Frank recognized the situation at once and went back to his engine-room without a whimper. He heard of her occasionally, of the triumphant show her beauty, her grace and her millions were making in the world. One day he saw her yacht in the harbor and resolved to ask for a position on her engine-room staff. Miss Fenacre answered his letter with a request for a personal interview, and when he walked down the street again it was as chief engineer of the Minnehaha.

SPRING was well begun when the Minnehaha sailed for Europe to take her place in the mimic fleets that were already assembling. As like seeks like, so the long, swift, white steamer headed like a bird for her far-away companions and arrived among them with colors flying and her guns roaring out salutes. By herself she was greedy for every pound of steam and raced her engines as though speed were a matter of life and death; but once in company she was content to lag with the slowest and suit her own pace to the stately progress of the schooners and cutters that moved by the wind alone. She found friends among all nations and, in that cosmopolitan society of ships, dipped her flag to that of England, France, Holland, Belgium and Germany.

It was a wonderful life of freedom and gayety. A great yacht carries her own letter of introduction and is accorded everywhere the courtesies of a man-of-war, to which, in a sense, she is almost a sister. Official visits are paid and returned; naval punctilio reigns; invitations are lavished from every side. There is, besides, a freemasonry among those splendid wanderers of the sea, a transcendent Bohemianism that puts them nearly all upon a common footing. A holiday spirit is in the air, and kings and princes, who at home are hidden within walls of triple brass, here unbend like children out of school, and make friends, and gossip about their neighbors, and show off their engine-rooms and their ice plant and some new idea in patent boat-davits after the manner of very ordinary mortals. Not, of course, that kings and princes predominate, but the same spirit prevails with those who on shore hold their heads very high and practice a jealous exclusiveness. Among them all Florence

Fenacre was a favorite of favorites. Young, beautiful and the mistress of a noble fortune, there was everything to cast a glamor about this charming American, who had come out of the unknown to take all hearts by storm.

Her haziness about distinctions of rank filled these Europeans with an amused amazement. There was to them something quite royal in her naiveté and lack of awe; in her high spirit, her vivacity and her absolute disregard of those who failed to please her. She convulsed one potentate by describing another as "that tiresome old man who's really too disreputable, you know, to have tagging around me any longer"; and had a quarrel and a making up with a duke about a lighter of coal that their respective crews had come to blows over. Everybody adored her and she seldom put to sea without a covey of love-sick yachts in her wake.

Of course, here as elsewhere, every phase of human character was displayed, and most conspicuous of all among the evil was the determination of many to win Florence's millions for themselves. Amid that noble concourse of vessels, every one of which stood for a princely income, there were adventurers as needy and as hungry as any sharper in the streets of New York. There is an aristocratic poverty, none the less real because you must add three naughts to all the figures, that first surprised and then disgusted the pretty American. Her first awakening to the fact was when, as a special favor, she sold her best steam launch to a French marquise at the price it had cost her. Though that lady was very profuse with little pink notes and could purr over Florence by the hour, her signature on a check was never forthcoming, and Florence had a fit of fury to think of having been so deceived.

"It was a downright confidence trick," she burst out to the Comte de Souvary, firing up afresh with the memory of her wrongs. "I loved my launch. It was a beauty. It never went dotty at the time you needed it most and it's name among the men was Old Reliable, and it was a vertical inverted triple expansion direct-acting propeller!" (Florence could always rattle off technical details, and showed her Americanism in her catalogue-like fluency in this respect.) "And I miss it and I want it back, and the horrid old woman never means to pay me a penny!"

"Oh, my child," said the count, "she never pays anybody ze penny. She is a stone for which one looks in vain for blood. Your launch is — what do you call it in ze Far Vest — a goner!"

"But she's descended from Charlemagne," cried Florence. "She has the entrée to all the courts. She ought to be exposed for swiping my boat!"

"What does anybody do when he is robbed?" said the count philosophically. He could afford to be philosophical: it wasn't his vertical inverted triple expansion direct-acting propeller.

"Smile and be more careful ze next time," he went on. "The marquise's reputation is international for what is charitably called her eccentricity."

"In America they put people in jail for that kind of eccentricity!" exclaimed Florence.

"Oh, the best way in Europe is money-with-order," said the count, "what I remember a friend seeing in that great country of which you are ze ornament — In God we trust: all others cash!"

"Well, it's a shame," said Florence, "and if I ever get the chance of a dark night I'll ram her with the Minnehaha!"

Florence's mother, a dear little old lady who did tatting and read the Christian Globe, was always the particular target of the fortune-hunters who pursued her daughter. It seemed such a brilliant idea to capture the mother first as the preparatory step of getting into the good graces of the heiress; and the old lady, who was one of the most guileless of her sex, never failed to fall into the trap and take the attentions all in earnest. The Comte de Souvary used to say that if you wished to find the wickedest men in Europe you had only to cast your eyes in the direction of Florence's mother; and she would be trotted off to church and driven in automobiles and lunched in casinos by the most notorious and unprincipled scapegraces of the Old World.

Florence, who like all heiresses had developed a positive instinct for the men who meant her mischief, was always delighted at the repeated captures of the old lady; and it was an endless entertainment to her when her mother was induced to champion the cause of some aristocratic ne'er-do-well.

"But, mamma," she would say, "I hate to call your friends names, but really he's a perfect scamp, and underneath all his fine manners he is no better than a wolf ravening for rich young lambs!"

"Oh, Florence, how can you be so uncharitable," her mother would retort. "If you could only hear the way he speaks of his mother and his ruined life, and how he is trying to be a better man for your sake ——"

"Always the same old story," said Florence. "It's wonderful the good I do just sailing around and radiating moral influence. The count says I ought to get a medal from the government with my profile on one side and a composite picture of my admirers on the other! And if I do, Mamsey, I'll give it to you to keep!"

—SHE BURST OUT, "... YOU LOVE HER—AND AS FOR ME I MIGHT AS WELL DROWN MYSELF"

Frank Rignold was sometimes tempted to curse the day that had ever brought him aboard the Minnehaha. To be a silent spectator of gayeties and festivities he could not share; to be condemned to stand aloof while he saw the woman he loved petted and sought after by men of exalted position — what could be imagined more detestable to a lover without hope, without the shadow of a claim, with nothing to look forward to except the inevitable day when a luckier fellow would carry her off before his eyes. He moped in secret and often spent hours locked in his cabin, sitting with his face in his hands, a prey to the bitterest melancholy and dejection. In public, however, he always bore himself unflinchingly, and was too proud a man and too innately a gentleman to allow his face to be read even by her. It was incumbent on him, so long as he drew her pay and wore her uniform, to act in all respects the part he was cast to play; and no one could have guessed, except perhaps the girl herself, that he had any other thought save to do his duty cheerfully and well.

Captain Landry sat in the saloon at the bottom of the table, Florence herself taking the head; but the other officers of the ship had a cozy mess-room of their own, presided over by Frank Rignold as the officer second in rank on board. Thus whole days might pass with no further exchange between himself and Florence than the customary good-morning when they happened to meet on deck. Except on the business of the ship it was tacitly understood that no officer should speak to her without being first addressed. The strict etiquette of a man-of-war prevailed; everything went forward with stereotyped precision and formality; the officers were supposed to comport themselves with impassivity and self-effacement. Florence had no more need of being conscious of their presence than if they had been so many automatons.

Her life and theirs offered a strange contrast. She in her little court of idlers and merrymakers; they, the grave men who were answerable for her safety, the exponents of a rigid routine, to whom the clang of the bells brought recurring duties and the exercise of their professional knowledge. To her, yachting was a play; to them, a business.

"I often remark your chief engineer," said the Comte de Souvary to Florence. "A handsome man, with an air at once sad and noble — one of zoze extraordinary Americans who keep for their machines the ardor we Europeans lavish on the women we love, and whose spirits when zey die turn without doubt into pétrole or electricity."

"I have known Mr. Rignold ever since I was a child," said Florence, pleased to hear Frank praised. "I regard him as one of my best and dearest friends."

"The more to his credit," said the count, astonished. "Many in such a galère would prove themselves presumptuous and troublesome."

"He is almost too much the other way," said Florence.

"Ah, that appeals to me," said the count. "I should be such anozer in his place. Proud, silent, unobtrusive, who gives dignity to what otherwise would be a false position."

"I came very near being his wife once," said Florence, impelled, she hardly knew why, to make the confession.

The count was thunderstruck.

"His wife!" he exclaimed.

"Before I was rich, you know," explained Florence, "A million years ago it seems now, when I lived in a little town and was a nobody."

"Anozer romance of the Far Vest," cried the count, to whom this term embraced the entire continent from Maine to San Francisco.

Florence was curiously capricious in her treatment of Frank Rignold. Often she would neglect him for weeks together, and then, in a sort of revulsion, would go almost to the other extreme. Sometimes at night when he would be pacing the deck she would come and take his arm and call him "Frank" under her breath and ask him if he still loved her; and in a manner, half-tender, half-mocking, would play on his feelings with a deliberate enjoyment of the pain she inflicted. Her greatest power of torment was her frankness. She would talk over her proposals; weigh one against the other; revel in her self-analysis and solemnly ask Frank his opinion on this or that part of her character. She talked with equal freedom of her regard for himself, and was almost brutal in confessing how hard it was to hold herself back.

"I think I must be awfully wicked, Frank," she said to him once. "I love you so dearly and yet I wouldn't marry you for anything!" And then she ran on as to whether she ought to take Souvary and live in Paris or Lord Comyngs and choose London. "It's so hard to decide," she said, "and it's so important, because one couldn't change one's mind afterward."

"Not very well," said Frank.

"You mustn't grind your teeth so loud," she said. "It's compromising."

"I wish you would talk about something else or go away," he said, goaded out of his usual politeness.

"Oh, I love my little stolen tête-à-têtes with you," she exclaimed. "All those other men are used up, emotionally speaking. The count would turn a neat phrase even if he were to blow his brains out the next minute. They think they are splendidly cool, but it only means that they have exhausted all their powers of sensation. You are delightfully primitive and unspoiled, and then I suppose it is natural to like a fellow-countryman best, isn't it? Have you found any girls over here you like as well as me?"

"I haven't tried to find any," said Frank.

"You aren't a bit disillusioned, are you?" she said. "You simply shut your eyes and go it blind. A woman loves that in a man. It's what love ought to be. It's silly of me to throw it away."

"Perhaps it is, Florence," he said "Who knows but what some day you may regret it."

"I often think of that," she returned. "I am afraid all the good part of me loves you, and all the bad loves the counts and dukes and earls, you know. And the good is almost drowned in all the rest, like vegetables in vegetable soup."

She excelled in giving such little dampers to sentiment, and laughed heartily at Frank's discomfiture.

"You can be awfully cruel," he said. "I wonder you can be so beautiful when you can think such things and say them. You treat hearts like toys and laugh when you break them."

"Well, there's one thing, Frank," she said seriously. "I have never pretended to you or tried to appear better than I am; and you are the only man I can say that to and not lie!"

IV

THE Comte de Souvary, toward whom Florence betrayed an inclination that seemed at times to deserve a warmer word, was a French gentleman nearing forty. He was a man of distinguished appearance, with all the gayety, grace and charm that, in spite of popular impression to the contrary, is not seldom found among the nobles of his country. His undoubted wealth and position redeemed his suit from any appearance of being inspired by a mercenary motive. Indeed he was accustomed himself to be pursued, and Florence and he recognized in each other a fellowship of persecution.

"We are ze Pale Faces," he would say, "and ze ozzers zey are Indians closing in from every corner of ze Far Vest for our scalps!"

He was, in many ways, the most accomplished man that Florence had ever known. He was a violinist, a singer, a poet, and yet these were but a part of his various gifts; for in everything out of doors he was no less a master and took the first place as though by right. He was the embodiment of everything daring and manly; it seemed natural for him to excel; he simply did not know what fear was. He was always ready to smile and turn a little joke, whether speeding in his automobile at a breakneck pace or ballooning above the clouds in search of what to him was the breath of life: "ze sensation." He could never see a new form of "ze sensation" without running for it like a child for a new toy. His whole attitude toward the world was that of a furious curiosity. He could not bear to leave it, he said, until he had learned how all the wheels went round. He had stood on the Matterhorn. He had driven the Sud express. He had exhausted lions and tigers. In moods of depression he would threaten to follow Andrée to the pole and figure out his plans on the back of an envelope.

"Magnificent!" he would cry, growing instantly cheerful at the prospect. "Think of ze sensation!"

He spoke English fluently, though shaky on the th and the w, and it was first hand and not mentally translated. His pronunciation of Far West, two words that were constantly on his lips, was an endless entertainment to Florence and out of a sense of humor she forebore to correct him. It was typical indeed of his ignorance of everything American. Europe was at his fingers' ends; there was not a country in it he was not familiar with, intimately familiar, knowing much of what went on behind the scenes, and the lives and characters of the men, and not less the women, who shaped national policies and held the steering-wheels of state.

"Murieff would never do that," he would say. "He is constitutionally inert, and his imagination has carried him through too many unfought wars for him to throw down the gage now. He smokes cigarettes and dreams of endless peace. I had many talks with him last year and found him impatient of any subject but the redemption of the paper ruble!"

But his mind had never crossed the Atlantic Ocean. He still thought that the Civil War had been between North and South America. To him the United States was a vague region peopled with miners, pork-packers and Indians; a jumble of factories, forests and red-shirted men digging for gold, all of it fantastically seen through the medium of Buffalo Bill's show. It was a constant wonder to him that such conditions had been able to produce a woman like Florence Fenacre.

"You are the flower of ze prairie," he would say, "an atavism of type, harking back a dozen generations to aristocratic progenitors, having nothing in common with the Pathfinder, your papa!"

"He wasn't a pathfinder," said Florence; "he was a whaler captain."

But this to the count seemed only the more remarkable. He raised the fabric of a fresh romance on the instant, especially (on Florence telling him more about her forebears) when he began to mix up the Pilgrim Fathers, the Revolutionary War and the Alabama in one brisk panorama of his ever dear "Far Vest!"

Florence's acquaintance with the Comte de Souvary went back to Majorca, where, in the course of one of those sudden blows, so common on the Mediterranean, their respective yachts had fled for shelter. His own was a large auxiliary schooner called the Paquita, a lofty, showy vessel which he sailed himself with his usual courage and audacity. He had the reputation of scaring his unhappy guests—when any were bold enough to accept his invitation—to within the proverbial inch of their lives; and they usually changed "ze sensation" for the nearest mail-boat home. Florence and he had struck up a warm friendship from the start, and for the whole summer their vessels were inseparable, sailing everywhere in company and anchoring side by side.

The count had a way of courtship peculiarly his own. He made it apparent from the start how deeply he had been stirred by Florence's beauty and how ready he was to offer her his hand; but as a matter of fact he never did so in set terms and treated her more as a comrade than a divinity. He talked of his own devotion to her as something detached and impersonal, willing as much as she to laugh over it and treat it lightly. He was never jealous, never exacting, and seemed to be as happy to share her with others as when he had her all alone in one of their tête-à-têtes. What he coveted most of all was her intimacy, her confidence, her frank expression of her own true self; and in this exchange he was willing to give as much as he received and often more. Sometimes she was piqued at his apparent indifference—at his lack of any stronger feeling for her—seeming to detect in him something of her own insouciance and coldness.

"You really don't care for me a bit," she said once. "I am only another form of 'ze sensation'—like going up in a balloon or riding on the cowcatcher."

"I keep myself well in hand," he returned. "I am not approaching the terrible age of forty without knowing a little at least about women and their ways."

"A little!" she exclaimed ironically. "You know enough to write a book!"

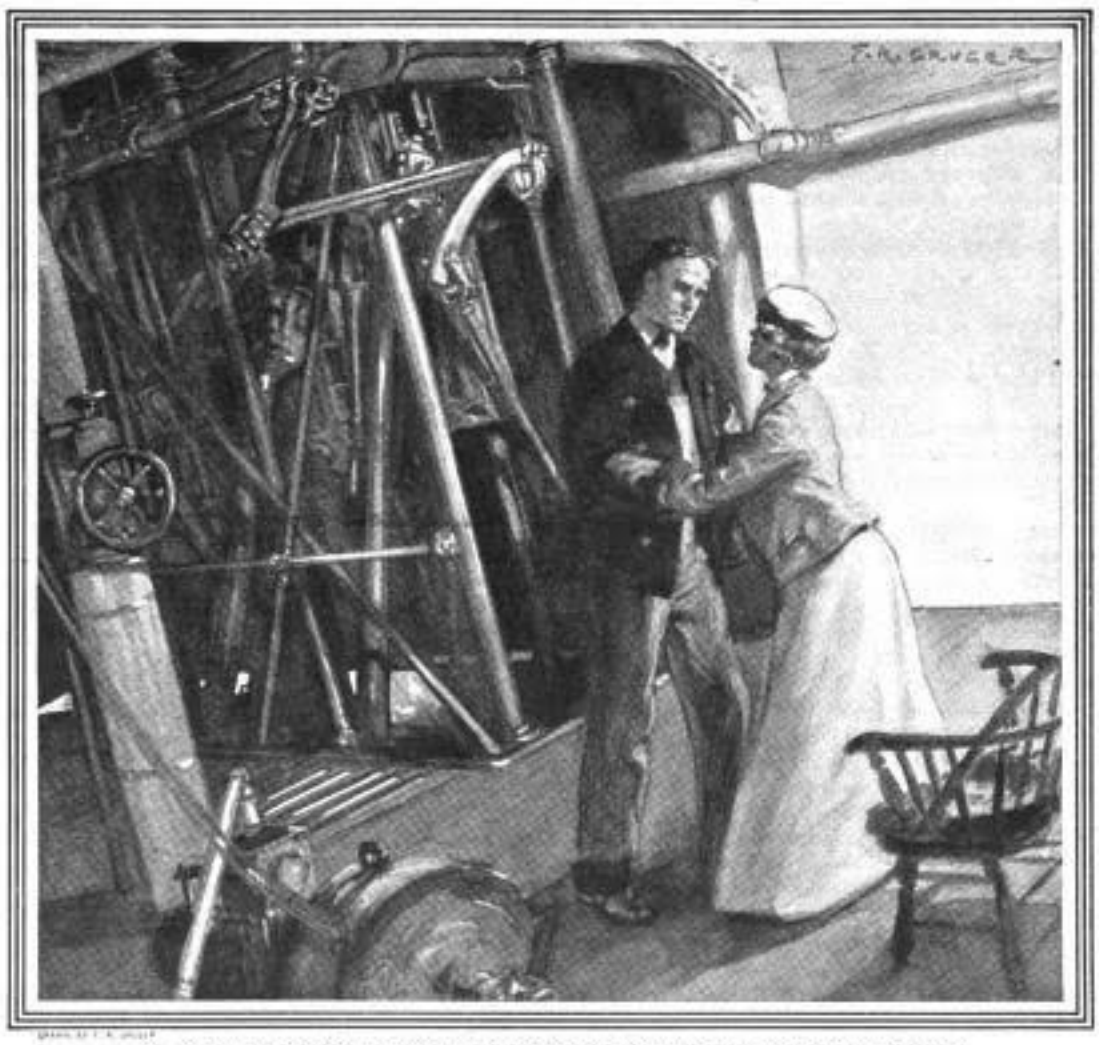
"Zat book has taught me to go very slow," he said. "Were I in my young manhood I'd come zoop, like that, and carry you off in ze Far Vest style. But I can never hope to be that again with any woman; my decreasing hair forbids, if nozing else; but my way is to make myself indispensable—ze old dog, ze old stand-by, as you Americans say—the good old harbor to which you will come at last when tired of ze storms outside!"

"Your humility is a new trait," said Florence.

"It's none ze less real because it is often hid," said the count. "I watch you very closely, more closely than perhaps you even think. You have all the heartlessness of youth and health and beauty. I would be wrong to put my one little piece of money on the table and lose all; and so I save and save, and play ze only game that offers me the least chance—ze waiting game!"

"I believe that's true," said Florence.

"Were I to act ze distracted lover you would laugh in my face," he went on earnestly. "Were I to propose and be refused my pride would not let me—my instinct as gentleman would not let me—go trailing after you with my long face. The idyl would be over. I would go!"



"There are times when I think a heap of you," said Florence encouragingly.

"Oh, I know so well how it would be," he continued. "A week of doubt—of fever; a rain of little notes; and then with your good, clear, honest Far Vest sense you would say: 'No, mon cher, it is eempossible!'"

"Yes, I suppose I should," said Florence.

"I would rather be your friend all my life," said the count, "than to be merely one of the rejected. I have no ambition to place my name on that already great list. I have never yet asked a woman to marry me, and when I do I care not for the expectation of being refused!"

"You are like all Europeans," said Florence. "You believe in a sure thing."

"—AND I THOUGHT IF ANYTHING HAPPENED I'D LIKE TO BE WITH YOU!"

"My heart is not on my sleeve," he returned, "and I value it too highly to lose it without compensation."

"It is interesting to hear all your views," said Florence. "I am sure I appreciate the compliment highly. It's a new idea, this of the wolf making a confident of the lamb."

"Oh, my dear," he broke out, "I am only a poor devil holding back from committing a great stupidity."

"Is that how you describe marrying me?" she said lightly.

"Ze day will come," he said, disregarding her question, "I think it will—I hope it will—when you will say to me: 'My dear fellow, I am tired of all this fictitious gayety; of all this rush and bustle and flirtation; of this life of fever and emptiness. I long for peace and do not know where to find it. I am like a piece of music to whom one waits in vain for the return to the keynote. Tell me where to find it or else I die!'"

"Rather forward of me to say all that, Count," observed the girl. "But suppose I did—what then?"

The count opened wide his arms.

"I would answer: here!" he said.

Thus the bright days passed, amid animating scenes, with memories of sky and cloud and noble headlands and stately, beautiful ships. Like two ocean sweethearts the Minnehaha and the Paquita took their restless way together, side by side in port, inseparable at sea. At night the one lit the other's road with a string of ruby lanterns and kept the pair in company across the dark and silent water. Their respective crews, not behindhand in this splendid camaraderie of ships, fraternized in wine-shops and strolled through the crooked foreign streets arm in arm. Breton and American, red cap and blue, sixty of the one and eighty of the other—they were brothers all and cemented their friendship in blood and gunpowder, in tattooed names, flags and mottoes, after the time-honored and artless manner of the sea.

In the drama of life it is often the least important actors who are happiest, and the stars themselves are not always to be the most envied. Florence, torn between her ambition and her love, knew what it was to toss all night on her sleepless bed and wet the pillow with her tears. De Souvary, who found himself every day deeper in the toils of his ravishing American, chafed and struggled with unavailing pangs; and as for Frank Rignold, he endured long periods of black depression as he watched from afar the steady progress of his rival's suit; and his moody face grew moodier and exasperation rose within him to the rebellion point.

V

BY SEPTEMBER the two yachts were lying in Cowes, and already there was some talk of winter plans and a possible voyage to India. The count was enthusiastic about the project, as he was about anything that could keep him and Florence together, and he ordered a stack of books and spent hours at a time with the mistress of the Minnehaha, reading over Indian Ocean directories and plotting imaginary courses on the chart. With the prospect of so extended a trip before him, Frank found much to be done in the engine-room, for their suggested cruise would be likely to carry them far out of the beaten track, and he had to be prepared for all contingencies. A marine engine requires to be perpetually tinkered, and an engineer's duty is not only to run it, but to make good the little defects and breakdowns that are constantly occurring. Frank was a daily visitor at the local machine-shop, and his business engagements with Mr. Derwent, the proprietor, led insensibly to others of the social kind.

Derwent's house was close by his works and Frank's trips ashore soon began to take in both. Derwent had a daughter, a black-haired, black-eyed, pink-cheeked girl named Cassie, one of those vigorous young English beauties that men would call stunning and women bold. She did not wait for any preliminaries but straightway fell in love with the handsome American engineer that her father brought home. She made her regard so plain that Frank was embarrassed, but she was not a bit put off at his reluctance to play the part she assigned to him.

"That's always my luck," she remarked with disarming candor; "a poor silly fool who always likes them that don't like me and spurns them that do!" And then she added with a laugh that he ought to be tied up, "for you are a cruel, handsome man, Frank, and my heart goes pit-a-pat at the very sight of you!"

She called him Frank at the second visit; and at the third seated herself on the arm of his chair and took his hand and held it.

"Can't you ever forget that girl in Yankeeland?" she said. "She ain't here, is she, and why shouldn't you steal a little harmless fun? There's men who'd give their little finger to win a kiss from me—and you sit there so glum and solemn, who could have a bushel for the asking!"

For all Frank's devotion to Florence he could not but be flattered at being wooed in this headlong fashion. He was only a man, after all, and she was the prettiest girl in port. He did not resist when she suddenly put her arms around him and pressed his head against her bosom, calling him her darling; but remained passive in her embrace, pleased and yet ashamed, and stung to the quick with self-contempt.

"You musn't," he said, freeing himself. "Cassie, it's wrong—it's dreadful. You mustn't think I love you, because I don't."

"Yes, but I am going to make you," she said with splendid effrontery, looking at herself in the glass and patting her rumpled hair. "See what you have done to me!"

Had she been older or more sophisticated Frank would have been shocked at this reversal of the sexes. But in her self-avowed and unashamed love for him she was more like a child than a woman; and her good humor and laughter besides seemed somehow to belittle her words and redeem the affair from any seriousness. Cassie made no demands of him and acquiesced with apparent cheerfulness in the implication that he loved another woman. She accepted the little that was left over, and though she wept many hot tears in secret, outwardly at least she never rebelled or reproached him. She knew that to do either would be to lose him.

It must not be supposed that all this went on unremarked, or that in the gossip of the yacht Frank and Cassie Derwent did not come in for a considerable share of attention. It passed from the officers' mess to the saloon, and Florence bit her lip with anger and jealousy when the joke went round of the chief engineer's "infatuation." In revenge she treated Frank more coldly than ever, and went out of her way to be agreeable to De Souvary, especially when the former was at hand and could be made a spectator of her loverlike glances and a warmth that seemed to transcend the limits of ordinary friendship. She made herself and Frank utterly unhappy.

She made no objection when Frank asked her permission to show the ship to Derwent and his daughter.

"You must be sure and introduce me," she said with a sparkle of her eyes that Frank was too unpresumptuous to understand. "They say that she is a raving little beauty and that you are the happy man!"

"I hope you don't think there is anything in it," he exclaimed very anxiously. "I suppose there has been some tittle-tattle—I can read it in your face—but there's not a word of truth in it—not a word, I assure you."

"I don't care the one way or other, Frank," she said. "You needn't explain so hard. What does it matter to me, anyway," and with that she turned away to cordially greet the count as he came aboard.

The two women met in the saloon. Florence at once assumed the great lady, the heiress, the condescending patrician; Cassie flushed and trembled; and in a buzz of commonplaces the stewards served tea while the two women covertly took each other's measure. Florence grew ashamed of her own behavior, and unbending a little, tried to put her guests at ease and led Cassie on to talk. Then it came out about the dance that Derwent and his daughter were to give.

"Frank and I have been arranging the cotillon," said Cassie, and then she turned pink to her ears at having called him by his first name before all those people. "I mean Mr. Rignold," she added, amid every one's laughter and her own desperate confusion. Florence's laughter rang out as gayly as any one's, and apparently as unaffectedly, and she rallied Cassie with much good humor on her slip.

Cassie cried when Frank and she returned home.

"She's a proud, haughty minx," she burst out, "and you love her—and as for me I might as well drown myself."

Frank attempted to comfort her.

"I—I thought it was a girl in America, Frank, a girl like me—just common and poor and perhaps not as nice as I am. And you know she wouldn't wipe her feet on you," she went on viciously, "she so grand with her yachts and her counts, and oh, I think I'll run over to Injya for the winter, or maybe it's the Cairo or the Nile, says she!"

Frank protested that she was mistaken; that it wasn't Miss Fenacre at all; that it was absurd even to think of it.

"Oh, Frank, it's bad enough as it is without your lying to me," she said, quite unconvinced and wiping away the tears. "You've set your eyes too high and unhappiness is all that you'll ever get from the likes of her. You're a fool in your way and I'm a fool in mine, and maybe when she's married to the count and done for you'll mind the little girl that's waiting for you in Cowes!"

"But I don't want you to, Cassie," he said. "You're talking like a baby. What's the good of waiting when I am never coming back?"

"You say that now," she exclaimed, "but my words will come back to you in Injya when you grow tired of her ladyship's coldness and disdain; and I'm silly enough to think you'll find them a comfort to you out there, with nothing to do but to think and think and be miserable."

VI

THE next day he found Cassie in a more cheerful humor and excited about the dance. The house was all upset and she was busy with a dozen of her girl friends in decorating the hall and drawing-room, taking up the carpets, arranging for the supper and the cloak-rooms, and immersed generally in the thousand and one tasks that fall on a hostess-to-be. Frank put himself at her orders and spent the better part of the afternoon in running errands and tacking up flags and branches; and after an hilarious tea, in the midst of all the litter and confusion, he went back to the ship somewhat after five o'clock. As he was pulled out in a shore boat he was surprised to pass a couple of coal lighters coming from the Minnehaha, and to see her winches busily hoisting in stores from a large launch alongside. He ran up the ladder, and seeing the captain asked him what was up.

"Sailing orders, Chief," said Captain Landry, enjoying his amazement. "We'll be off the ground in half an hour, Eastward bound!"

"But I wasn't told anything," cried Frank. "I never got any orders!"

"The little lady said you wasn't to be disturbed," said the captain, "and she took it on herself to order your staff to go ahead. I guess you'll find a pretty good head of steam already!"

Frank ran to the side and called back his boat, giving the man five shillings to take a note at once to Cassie. He had no time for more than a few lines, but he could not go to sea without at least one word of farewell. They were catting the anchor and were already under steerage way when Cassie came off herself in a launch and passed up a letter directed to the chief engineer. It reached him in the engine-room, where he, not knowing that she was but a few feet distant, was happily spared the sight of her pale and despairing face.

The letter itself was almost incoherent. She knew, she said, whom she had to thank for his departure. That vixen, that hussy, that stuck-up minx, who treated him like a dog and yet grudged him to another, who, God help her, loved him too well for her own good—it was her ladyship she had to thank for spoiling everything and carrying him away. Was he not man enough to assert himself and leave a ship where he was put upon so awful? Let him ask her Mightiness in two words, yes or no; and then when he had come down from the clouds and had learned the truth, poor silly fool—then let him come back to his Cassie, who loved him so dear, and who (if she did say it herself) had a heart worth fifty of his mistress', and didn't need no powder to set off her complexion. It ended with a piteous appeal to his compassion and besought him to write to her from the nearest port.

Frank sighed as he read it. Everything in the world seemed wrong and at cross-purposes. Those who had one thing invariably longed for something else, and there was no content or happiness or satisfaction anywhere. The better off were the acquiescent, who took the good and the bad with the same composure and found their only pleasure in their work. Best off of all were the dead whose sufferings were over. But, after all, it was sweet to be loved, even if one did not love back, and Frank was very tender with the little letter and put it carefully in his pocketbook. Yes, it was sweet to be loved. He said this over and over to himself, and wondered whether Florence felt the same to him as he did to Cassie. It seemed to explain so much. It seemed the key to her strange regard for him. He asked himself whether it could be true that she had wilfully ordered the ship to sea in order to prevent his going to the dance. The thought stirred him inexpressibly. What other explanation was there if this were not the one? And she had deserted the count, who was away in London on a day's business; deserted the Paquita at anchor in the roads! He was frightened at his own exultation. Suppose he were wrong in this surmise. Suppose it were just another of her caprices!

They ran down Channel at full speed and at night were abreast of the Scilly lights, driving toward the Bay of Biscay in the teeth of an equinoctial gale. At the behest of one girl, eighty men had to endure the discomfort of a storm at sea, and a great steel ship, straining and quivering, was flung into the wild black night. It seemed a misuse of power that, at a woman's whim, so many lives and so noble and costly a fabric could be risked in vain. From the captain on the bridge, dripping in his oil-skins, to the coal-passers and firemen below who fed the mighty furnaces, to the cooks in the galley, the engineers, the electrician on duty, the lookout man in the bow clinging to the life-line when the Minnehaha buried her nose out of sight—all these perforce had to rise and do at Florence's bidding without question or revolt.

Frank's elation passed and left him in a bitter humor toward her. It was not right, he said to himself, not right at all. She ought to show a little consideration for the men who had served her so well and faithfully. Besides, it was unworthy of her to spoil Cassie's dance and betray such pettiness. He felt for the girl's humiliation, and though not in love with her, he was conscious of a sentiment that hated to see her hurt. He would not accept Florence's invitation to dine in the saloon, sending word that he had a headache and begged to be excused; and after dinner, when she sought him out on deck and tried to make herself very sweet to him, he was purposely reserved and distant, and took the first opportunity to move away. He was angry and disheartened.

Toward eleven o'clock at night, as Frank was in the engine-room moodily turning over these reflections in his mind and listening to the râce of the screws as again and again they were lifted out of the water and strained the shafts and engines to the utmost, he was surprised to see Florence herself descending the steel ladder into that close atmosphere of oil and steam. He ran to help her down, and taking her arm led her to one side where they might be out of the way. Here, in the glare of the lanterns, he looked down into her face and thought again how beautiful she was. Her cheek was wet with spray, and her hair was tangled and glistening beneath her little yachting cap. She seemed to exhale a breath of the wild air above and bring down with her something of the gale itself. She held fast to Frank as the ship labored and plunged, smiling as their eyes met.

"You are the last person I expected down here," said Frank.

"I was beginning to get afraid," she returned. "It's blowing terribly, Frank—and I thought if anything happened I'd like to be with you!"

"Oh, we are all right," said Frank, his professional spirit aroused. "With twin screws, twin engines and plenty of sea room—why, let it blow!"

His confidence reassured her. He never appeared to her so strong, so self-reliant and calm as at that moment of her incipient fear. Among his engines Frank always wore a masterful air, for he had that instinct for machinery peculiarly American, and was competent to the point of genius.

"Besides, I wanted to ask you a question," said Florence. "I had to ask it. I couldn't sleep without asking it, Frank."

"I would have come if you had sent for me," he said, not a little curious to know what she wanted.

"I couldn't wait for that," she returned. "I knew it might be hard for you to leave—or impossible."

"What is it, Florence?" he asked.

She looked at him strangely, her lustrous eyes wide open and bright with her unsaid thoughts.

"Are you very fond of her, Frank?" she asked.

"Her? Who?" he exclaimed. "You don't mean Cassie Derwent?"

"Yes," she said.

"Of course I'm fond of her," he said.

"More than you are of me, Frank?" she persisted.

"Oh, it isn't the same sort of thing, Florence," he said. "I never even thought of comparing you and her together. Surely you know that? Surely you understand that?"

"You used to—to love me once, Frank," she said with a stifled sob. "Has she made it any less? Has she robbed me, Frank? Have I lost you without knowing it?"

"No," he said, "no, a thousand times, no!"

"Tell me that you love me, Frank," she burst out. "Tell me, tell me!" Then as he did not answer she went on passionately: "That's why I went to sea, Frank. I was mad with jealousy. I couldn't give you up to her. I couldn't let her have you!"

She pressed closer against him, and tiptoeing so as to raise her mouth to his ear she whispered: "I always liked you better than anybody else in the world, Frank. I love you! I love you!"

For the moment he could not realize his own good fortune. He could do nothing but look into her eyes. It was her reproach for years afterward that she had to kiss him first.

"I suppose it had to come, Frank," she said. "I fought all I could, but it didn't seem any use!"

"It was inevitable," he returned solemnly. "God made you for me and me for you!"

"Amen," she said, and in an ecstasy of abandonment whispered again: "I love you, Frank. I love you!"

(THE END)

TO YOU

By Charles Battell Loomis

Young man, you can Make a hit—be IT.
It's up to you to do
What you were made for and fed and prayed for.
So don't sit down and frown
And groan and moan
And wait—and rail at Fate—
And speak of a clique
That prevents events
From coming your way. A sure way
To invite disaster which comes the faster
If you beckon to it—for then you woo it.
Just say, "I will do better than Bill
Or Ned or Fred or Ted,"
As the case may be. Because, you see,
A thing's half done that's well begun.
There's something you can do
In a way to pay.
Don't whine or grunt, but do your stunt,
And after a while you'll smile
And say, "I may Be happy yet." You bet!

How Modern College Students Work Their Way—By Forrest Crissey

ROMANCE in college careers has not yet been wholly crushed out. The class of 1903 will have stories to tell as good as those which they have already heard from the "grads" of an older generation.

Hanging on the wall of a well-known Chicago preacher's study is an old-fashioned bucksaw, its blade still bright and its handle worn smooth by long use. This saw stands as a symbol of old-time methods of self-support in undergraduate experience. But the reign of the bucksaw is now at its end; it no longer represents an almost universal experience of the American boy working his way through college. True, this weapon of self-support has not been banished from the field, especially in the "freshwater" colleges, but it is no longer entitled to stand as an emblem of the entire fraternity. Another symbol must supplant the bucksaw, and the choice is not easily determined, for the change in methods of self-support among college students has been very great. This expansion of the working field open to youths dependent upon their own resources and determined to taste the consolations of the higher education has been greater in the universities and colleges located in cities of considerable size than in the colleges situated in comparatively small towns and villages. But, despite this almost universal change in the methods and means of self-support, the sturdy spirit that drove the bucksaws of the previous generation still holds sway; young men and women are still following high educational ideals, and sacrificing pleasure, comfort, and even the necessities of life, in their pursuits; real heroism and romance are being woven into the college associations of to-day as truly as they were when men who are now the nation's leaders were "working their way" toward coveted degrees.

SOME OF THE MANIFOLD DEVICES BY WHICH PERSISTENT, RESOURCEFUL BOYS AND GIRLS PUSH THEIR WAY TO AN EDUCATION

The Breaker-Boy Who Made His Way

A FINE example of the survival of this old-fashioned thirst for a college education is to be found in a certain boarding-house in connection with the University of Chicago. Serving the "French table" in this institution is a lad of about eighteen years of age whose face and figure hint of his Pennsylvania Dutch ancestry. Only the French language is permitted to be spoken at this table, and the waiter comes under this rule as well as the guests. Little more than a year ago this lad who now takes his orders in French could not read or write, and the story of his coming to Chicago is one of the romance chapters in the history of the University of Chicago.

Shy and trembling, but with a mask of stolidity on his countenance, this boy of seventeen timidly made his way to the office of the president's secretary. Awkwardly fumbling his cap, he announced that he came from Pennsylvania to "get a college education." His clothes were tattered and grimy, his hair unkempt, and his speech of a sort unfamiliar to the official of the University. A few kindly questions drew from the boy the still more astonishing information that he could not read, write, add, subtract or multiply.

"But tell me what started you to come here, and how you made your way?" said the official. Then, in his curious dialect, the lad told this story. His home was in the coal-fields and his only education had been at the "breakers." Only a few months before his father had suddenly died the tragic death of a coal miner. Then there was a family council in the little cabin at which the mother said the final word: "There is only one way out of this kind of life. You must get a college education." From the meagre fund which the tragedy had left in her hands she took ten dollars, gave it to the boy, and told him to go to the big university at Chicago. These instructions were ample, and the boy started on the long journey full of faith in the ultimate outcome. Without drawing any fine moral distinctions, he began the struggle to "beat" his way to Chicago by stowing himself in box-cars, riding on the trucks underneath freight cars, and otherwise outwitting the vigilance of train crews. Often he was compelled to "lay over" and do odd jobs in towns and cities for a little food, but more frequently he went hungry. His whole purpose was to keep intact his educational fund of ten dollars and still get on toward Chicago, and this he did with the grit and shrewdness of a true "breaker-boy."

At last he landed in Chicago. In the mining town in which he had lived the saloon was the centre of social life, and consequently he at once drifted into one of these public houses—a dive in South Clark Street. Here he secured permission to leave his bundle of clothes and personal trinkets while he went out to look for a place to work for his "keep." On returning he was gruffly told by the barkeeper that he must pay two dollars charges for the storage of his bundle. Although realizing the injustice of this demand, his training under oppression had taught him to avoid "making trouble," and consequently he quietly parted with this heavy draft upon his little hoard of capital. Then he trudged out to the University to meet his fate.

Before this story was finished the official who heard it decided that here was college timber of the right sort. He found a place for the lad to earn his board by waiting upon table and also interested a young woman in the boy's case. Under her tutelage he learned to read, write and "figure" so rapidly that he was soon entered in the preparatory school connected with the University, where he is now one of the brightest students. At the "French table" which he serves he has picked up a fair familiarity with that tongue, and is on the way to a full college career.

An Undergraduate School of Practical Politics

IT IS a far cry from wood-sawing to practical politics, but the latter is a favorite resource for self-supporting students in the University of Chicago. In the recent municipal campaign full forty of the most athletic undergraduates of the University found profitable employment as "watchers" at the polls. Most of them were members of the various ball teams. They were sent into the toughest districts of the city where the party employing them was in hopeless minority. One of these watchers, a freshman weighing 230 pounds and a trained boxer, found himself suddenly beset by a gang of hoodlums. For ten minutes he was busier than he has ever been as right-guard on the football team, but he used his fists so adroitly that at the end of the battle he had upheld the dignity of his colors and pounded into the sluggers of the First Ward a new respect for higher education. Another of the athletes, not quite so "handy" with his fists, was attacked by two women and a man armed with knives. The outcome of the struggle seemed in doubt for several moments, but his coolness and grit saved him from serious injury, and he gave a good account of himself. Not all of these battles at the polls have scored triumph for the undergraduates, but it is certain that their participants have learned more about practical politics while earning election money than in a whole course of classroom lectures.

Those students, however, who have made the largest earnings in the political field have depended more upon their powers of diplomacy than upon their muscle. This work is paid for at rates depending upon the generosity of the political candidates or their managers. Recently a reform candidate for the State Senate engaged a squad of picked college men to make a house-to-house canvass of his district. These students were chosen for their tact and pleasing personal address, and were sent upon their mission armed with arguments and petitions. Their instructions were to get signatures where possible, but to make friends wherever they went. Although the opposition to their candidate was strong, and many doors were shut in their faces, they returned to headquarters with 1200 signatures. More important than this, they had entered into their work with an enthusiasm and intelligence which aroused public sentiment to a high pitch and carried the district for their candidate. For this work they received fifty cents an hour, and the total added materially to their school fund, besides demonstrating that the college man is among the best of political canvassers. Many more of the young men of the University found employment as regular party canvassers, going from house to house, immediately preceding the election, to learn the political preference of the voters and thus enable the party leaders to make a close estimate of their strength.

Probably the most successful of the self-supporting who ever matriculated at the University was a young man who followed the novel calling of giving massage and exercise treatment to "select clients" among the wealthy men of Kenwood. He reduced corpulency and kept the "high livers" of that aristocratic suburb in condition at the rate of a dollar and a half an hour. Not only did he pay his way by this means, but he also made an excellent class record and left the University with a substantial bank account to his credit.

Another equally interesting case is that of a young man who was invited to come from a "freshwater" college to the University because of his skill in playing the bass tuba. He was needed in the University band, and was told that employment sufficient for his support would be found him if he would make the change. Almost immediately after his arrival work was supplied him as coach and companion for the son of a wealthy merchant. This boy was a little backward in development, and the freshman was employed to give him both physical and mental training. In return for this service the student was given a home in the family, all of his living and routine expenses were provided him, and he was also paid a salary of fifty dollars a month. This arrangement was so satisfactory to the boy's father that the freshman was taken, without cost to him, on the extensive travels in which the family indulged during the vacation months.

Opportunities for exercise of business talent are always open to the students attending a college or university located in a large city. One young man, who came into the University of Chicago from a farm thirty-five miles from Chicago, is doing a thriving business in selling butter and eggs from his father's farm to the faculty. This demands little of his time and clears him about eight dollars a week. Another resourceful boy is paying his entire way through his agency for theatre tickets, which he established and has developed to surprising proportions by his care and promptness. His charge is the moderate commission of ten cents on each ticket bought. A season of grand opera usually nets him at least $150. This, in addition to his regular patronage, enables him to take his university course in comfort. One reason for his success lies in the fact that the theatres will not reserve seats on individual orders sent in by telephone, whereas, by special arrangement with the managers, he is allowed this privilege. By doing a strictly cash business he insures himself against losses.

A Suburban Shopping Service

SOMETIMES the business ventures of the self-supporting students achieve an embarrassing success. An instance illustrating the possibilities of this development is found in the experience of a boy who established a messenger and shopping service. He made two trips daily from the University to the business centre of the city, and executed his commissions with such skill and judgment that he soon found himself swamped with orders. Then he attempted to employ assistants. This experiment proved to be his stumbling-block. His helpers could not give satisfaction, and finally so demoralized his business that he was compelled to abandon it. His experience, however, is useful in demonstrating the fact that two or three conscientious students may jointly operate a venture of this kind with every promise of success.

A very considerable number of undergraduates make their way by acting as night and relief clerks in drug stores and small hotels. Others serve as "gate-keepers" in the employ of steam railroads handling a large suburban passenger service, and still others find employment as extra conductors on the elevated railroad, working mainly during the rush hours of the morning and early evening. A few are able to make their way by serving as night operators at telephone switchboards, and one student makes a good salary as a night telegraph operator.

Among the more traditional means of self-support in the large city is the work of the lamplighter and the newspaper carrier, and many a man now working his way will some time revive "old college days" with tales of his night and morning "runs" through storm and sleet, carrying the lamplighter's torch or a bundle of morning papers.

Often some personal gift furnishes the key to the student's opportunity for self-support. One young man, with an artistic bent, finds profitable work through his skill in coloring lantern slides and in operating the stereopticon lantern, another student with a good knowledge of French does translating for a publishing house, and still another earns twelve dollars a week setting type in a printing office.

As a rule, large colleges and universities do not encourage girls and young women to matriculate unless provided with funds practically sufficient to carry them through the year. Occasionally, however, a young woman shows the resourcefulness and determination which override this standing discouragement. One such instance is well remembered in President Harper's office.

"I have come," said this applicant, "to enter this university and to stay until I get my degree. I haven't a dollar to start with, but I am strong and willing to do any kind of work that offers."

All objections and discouragements she was likely to encounter were earnestly urged upon her, but she would not yield. Finally she was given a place in a boarding-house where she served the table and did some kitchen work. While this provided her with food and shelter it gave her no funds for incidental expenses. But she was equal to this emergency, and asked permission to post a notice on the bulletin-board which read, "Mending and darning neatly done. Leave your order. Work called for and delivered. Prices reasonable." An order-book was hung below the notice, and in a few days the courageous young woman was well supplied with work. She "darned her way" through the University, secured her coveted degree, and is now a teacher in a Philadelphia high school.

A good working knowledge of stenography and typewriting is recognized by the officials of colleges and universities as undoubtedly the best equipment for self-support with which a young woman can enter upon the long struggle for a degree. The volume of this kind of work done in an educational institution of the first class is very large, as nearly all of the faculty, as well as many of the undergraduates, are engaged in literary labors in addition to their routine work and correspondence. In many instances good stenographers receive as high as seventy-five cents an hour for dictation and ten cents a page for transcribing their notes. A good reading voice is another excellent element of equipment in this field for young women who have set themselves the task of working their way through college. This often enables them to secure positions as companions to invalids and elderly women. An ability to entertain and care for children is also a desirable quality for a self-supporting young woman at college, for nurse-maids and governesses are much in demand. Department stores and the smaller shops and stores of large cities furnish a means of at least partial self-support to many young men and women attending the metropolitan college, and scores of undergraduates are found behind the counters of these institutions, especially during the season of holiday trade.

The Boy Who Enlisted for the Whole War

CERTAINLY one of the most novel and attractive vocations now followed by the independent college student is that of traveling guide. One young University of Chicago boy, with a liking for mechanical and industrial affairs, earns a comfortable livelihood by acting as "guide" to the sons of wealthy business men. Regularly he takes his young charges through the great business houses and manufacturing plants and explains their operation and significance in detail. His success is sufficient to warrant the presumption that any bright undergraduate located in a large city may reasonably expect to make his way by adopting this novel calling.

Although the University of Chicago and other large educational institutions have found it necessary to organize regular employment bureaus for the benefit of students desiring to become self-supporting, some of the newcomers who must earn their way are so resourceful and energetic that they are quite independent of this official aid. The spirit of this class of students is shown by the experience of a young man from San Francisco. He wrote to the University saying that he had been employed as a stenographer in the general office of a railroad company, and supposed that he was doing good work until he saw two men promoted over his head. Then he knew there was some deficiency in his equipment. It was not in his stenographic skill, and consequently he concluded it must be in his general education. He desired to learn the full details of requirements for a university course. Shortly after his letter had been answered and about two months before the opening of the college year this young man presented himself at the President's office and referred to his letter.

"But why have you come so far in advance of the beginning of your term?" he was asked.

"Oh, I thought it would be well to get the lay of the land and have everything in shape before then," he answered.

"Of course," was the reply, "the first thing to do is to look up some work for you. We have a regular employment bureau to which you may apply——"

"No," interrupted the young man, "I've got a good job myself—picked it up on my way across the city, not an hour after I'd landed. What I'm worried about is the study end of the business; I'll get along all right on the other things."

It was found that, contrary to his expectations, he was not able to enter the University, but must spend two years or more in the preparatory school.

"That's rather hard," he commented, "and it's more than I bargained for, but I'm not going to have any more young chaps that can't do better work than I promoted over my head if a university training will stop it. So I'll enlist for the whole war."

He is now making an excellent scholarship record in addition to earning a comfortable living. His push, energy and way of doing things are accounted a positive and valuable influence at the University.

Country College or City University?

DR. RICHARD C. HUGHES, President of Ripon College, Wisconsin—one of the most progressive of the "freshwater" colleges of the West—draws the following comparisons between the conditions in the country college and the city university, so far as the self-supporting student is concerned:

"For the undergraduate," declares Doctor Hughes, "a college may be too large or too small and may be located in too large a city or too small a town. Graduate and professional schools are better located in large centres, but the undergraduate student can do his best work in a country college strong enough to have good first-class equipment, located in a town large enough to provide all the comforts of modern life but small enough to be free from the temptations and distractions of a great city. This country location is best from the educational point of view to give students opportunity for fellowship with each other and with the faculty that they cannot get in the larger crowd. It provides a more simple and wholesome life at a time when this is most important for rich and poor alike. The boy reared under such conditions early adapts himself to any conditions in later life.

"The matter of smaller expense in this country location makes it possible for very many to secure a liberal education who could not afford the expensive life of the city or the city university. The earning capacity of the average Freshman is small. If he is obliged to work any part of his way the cost needs to be low. The cost for an education in the city university ranges from $600 to $1000 for the average student. A multitude of our best students who make the most useful men come from homes where the total income is not more than this. He is a rare boy who can leave such a home and make his own way in the university from the first. However, many test their powers in the small college for the first years of their course, and then continue to work their way in the more expensive university. This they find very practical and satisfactory.

"Often the question is asked: Is it possible for young men handicapped by poverty to take high rank in their studies and make success in after life? In my own experience, one man who sawed wood and made gardens to earn his way took high rank in his classes, is now a successful business man and a member of the Senate of his State. Another who worked for his board in a private family, doing odd chores, is dean of one of the most important schools in a large university. Another, a German lad, tutored in German throughout his course and is now at the head of a large mission enterprise of great value to his people. I persuaded a boy to leave his father's tailor's bench to enter a small college. Neither the father nor I had any idea of what was latent in the lad. During the last years of his course he tutored in biology. Upon graduation he took his Ph. D. in physiological chemistry in one of the strongest graduate schools in the country, and, although a very young man, has already done valuable service in the field of bacteriology. Except for this near-by small college he would never have dreamed of an education beyond the common school.

"I know a lawyer not more than forty-five years of age, with a practice amounting to nearly $20,000 a year, who walked barefoot to the country college, fifteen miles from his home, earned his way throughout the course by manual labor, and made it a practice not to wear his shoes in the summer excepting under extreme necessity, in order to save them for the colder weather when he needed them more. He took front rank in his profession from the start, and is to-day a man of great influence and character.

The Cost of Living

"AS TO methods of self-support, our boys now in college do about as boys always have done when under the necessity of earning money: take the job that comes first to hand. One boy keeps the books in two of the town stores and has an agency for a laundry. Another is janitor of the public-school building, and is the best janitor the school board has ever employed. He is making a record for thoroughness and accuracy that will be a valuable asset when he leaves college to enter business. Two are teaching in the high school one hour a day, and several find odd jobs about the homes in the town. Others report for the city papers and very many spend their vacation in canvassing.

"Country colleges make it a point to keep expenses low so that any student can be entirely independent of charity. The greatest handicap a boy can have is to form the habit of receiving charity. Generally they have some scholarships to be awarded, but they are bestowed for merit. Students are expected to earn them by doing exceptional work, and at Ripon we make no exception in favor of students entering the ministry or any other profession. It is a mistake for a boy to enter a university or college where the life is too expensive for him, and allow himself to be helped with money he does not earn.

"There are many students of the smaller colleges whose total expenses for the college year are not more than $200. They tell me they are happy and contented, they take their full part in college society and athletics, and are ready to take their chances in a contest with any city-bred men coming from the large universities, either in the classroom or in the larger outside world."

Judge James A. Blanchard, of the Supreme Court of New York, was once asked by a man who had been reared in the East:

"Don't you think you could have made your way to the high position you hold more readily if you had had a degree from one of the great universities?"

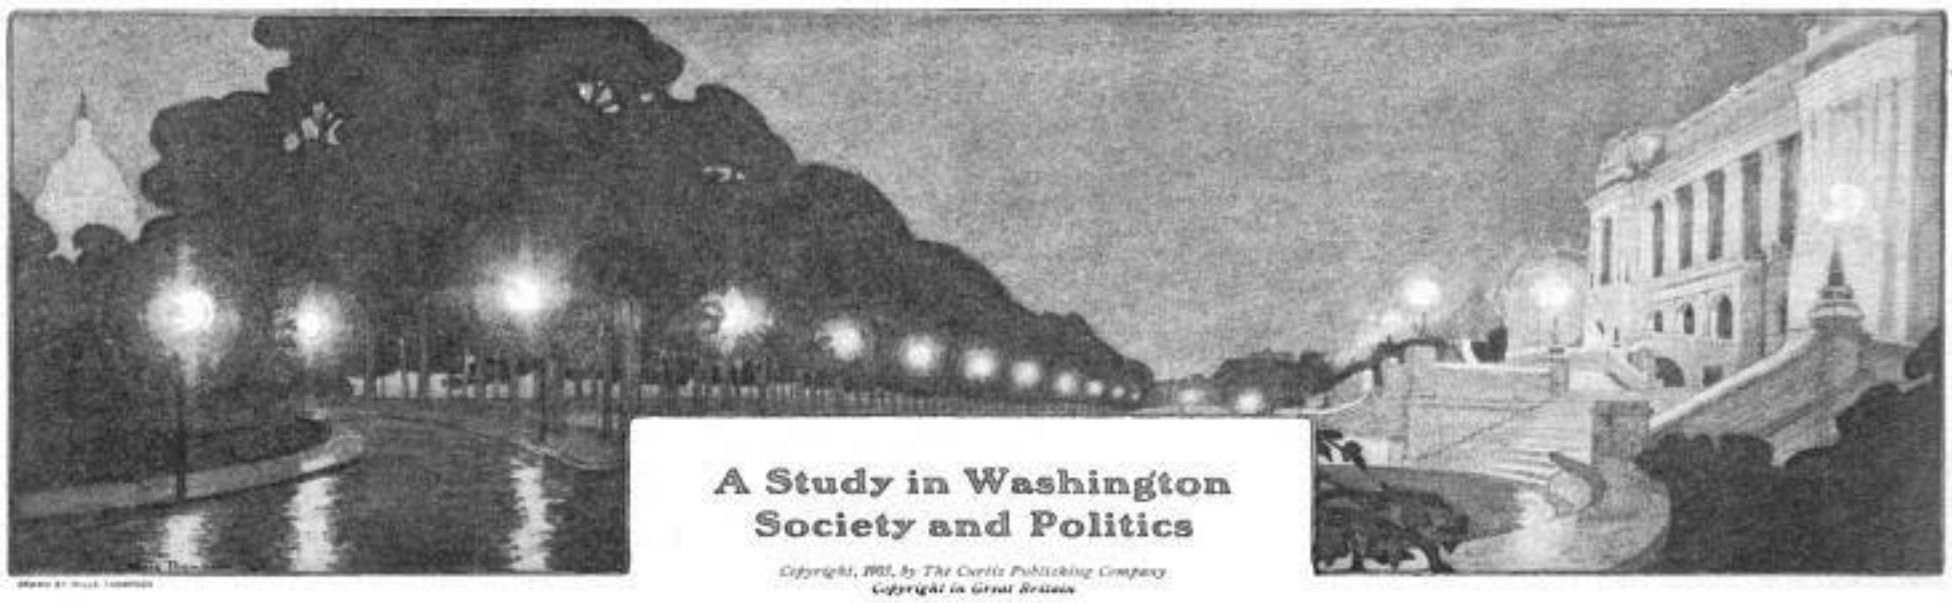
"I don't know anything about that," replied the well-known jurist, "but I am quite certain that I should never have left the farm if it hadn't been for the little "freshwater" college near my home. I entered there for a few terms' work at a time when it would have been impossible for me to have gone East or to any large college or university. At that time I fully expected to return to the farm and spend my life in agriculture. But my ambition became aroused, I found it was possible to make my own way, and so I continued the fight and finished the entire course. And there have been hundreds of such instances in connection with the smaller country colleges."

The Principle of Protection

WHEN the last tariff squabble was on a number of importers called on Senator Platt at his office in New York to protest against the proposed increased duties on Oriental rugs. "It will kill the rug business," said the spokesman. "The duty is too high now, and if it is increased to this absurd figure we cannot import rugs and sell them. Why should the duty be increased?"

"Well," replied the Senator, "some of our fellows make rugs up in Amsterdam. They want the duty set higher. That's the principle of protection, you know."

"But, my dear Senator," protested the rug man, "don't you see that with rugs costing us so much to import there will be no chance to get rid of them?"



"Is that a calamity?" inquired Senator Platt. "Why can't we make Oriental rugs in New York? Our fellows up in Amsterdam say they can make them just as good there as anywhere else."

Then the importers entered on a long argument to show the Senator that the making of Oriental rugs is an art cultivated for centuries and that the workmen, the local conditions and the atmosphere are not to be found in New York. "Indeed," the argument concluded, "we can no more produce Oriental rugs in New York than we can produce Titians."

"Oh, well," said the Senator, "none of our fellows is making Titians now, and I'll be glad to help you about those."

CHAPTER IX

ON THE first Monday in December—a gloriously bright winter day—the flags were run up over the Senate and House wings of the Capitol building. Congress had met once more.

There were the usual thronging multitudes in the corridors, the usual pleasant buzz of meeting and greeting in cloak and committee rooms, and the cheerfulness and exhilaration of the last session were flamboyant in the present one.

Among the last members of the House to arrive was Julian Crane. He had come late because he wished to put off as long as possible the meeting with Senator Bicknell. Of course, they must meet early and often, but that did not make Crane take any less pains to postpone, if even for a day, the sight of the man he had betrayed. But almost the first acquaintance he ran across was the Senator, in a group of brother Senators who had strolled over to the House side.

Senator Bicknell greeted Crane with unusual cordiality. In the first place, he really wished to attach Crane to the Bicknell chariot, but he had such agreeable recollections of his August day in Circleville, of Annette and her muslin gown, her roast chicken and boiled corn, her sweet, fresh, spare bedroom, where he had enjoyed one of the best naps of his life, and her impromptu reception in the afternoon, that he felt an increased kindliness for Crane. He showed this by buttonholing Crane in the midst of the group of Senators and telling the story of his day in Circleville. He paid Annette many sincere compliments, and declared that if Crane should enter the Senatorial contest a year and a half hence and should defeat him it would simply be on account of the charming Mrs. Crane. It was not fair to pit a man with such a lovely wife against a hopeless and incurable bachelor like himself.

Under other circumstances Crane would have been highly gratified, but now it tortured him. He heard once more ringing in his ears Governor Sanders' words, "It is absolutely necessary that Senator Bicknell be not taken into our confidence." To cap the climax, Senator Bicknell said:

"Be sure and give my warmest regards to Mrs. Crane and tell her I shall take the first opportunity to call on her—she is here, I suppose? She mentioned last summer that she was coming on with you."

"Yes," replied Crane, "we are established for the season." And he gave the name of a comfortable, but not expensive, apartment house where they had quarters.

"And say to her that, although I can't give her a dinner half so good as she gave me, I shall expect her and you to arrange to dine with me at my house at a very early day."

Crane escaped and went to his seat in the House. While he was contemplating the baseness of his own conduct Thorndyke came over and spoke to him.

Thorndyke's first impression of Crane was that he looked haggard and worn, and Crane's impression of Thorndyke was that he had grown about ten years younger. His greeting to Thorndyke was very cordial, but he was conscious of a strange thing: that ever since his bargain with Sanders, the meeting with former friends, men of sterling probity, gave him a vague uneasiness. It seemed to him as if, in duping Senator Bicknell, he was duping every honest man he knew. Thorndyke, too, asked after Mrs. Crane, and it began to dawn upon Crane's mind that Annette had the power, in a remarkable degree, of pleasing men of the world. Still, he thought her not quite good enough for himself, particularly if the brilliant future he planned should materialize—as it must and should.

The proceedings of the day were perfunctory, and it was but little after three o'clock when Thorndyke left the House. The afternoon was briskly cold, and the sun glittered from a heaven as blue as June. Just as Thorndyke came out on the plaza he encountered Crane, who would have avoided him—but it was scarcely possible.

The two men walked down the hill and toward Thorndyke's old quarters. They talked amicably and even intimately, but Thorndyke got a curious impression of reserve from Crane—and reserve was the last thing in the world to develop in Julian Crane. The truth of the matter was, of course, that Crane was turning over in a gloomy self-absorption all the difficulties of his situation, which were accentuated by his being in Washington. The strong fancy which Senator Bicknell had taken to Annette made everything harder. It seemed as if all those things which might be reckoned an unmixed good for an honest man were a burden and a perplexity to him, Julian Crane.

Thinking these uncomfortable thoughts, he found himself before the apartment house and went to his own quarters. They were small and cramped, but the locality was good and the outlook was pleasant. Annette and the two children met him with smiles. The children had grown acquainted with him and had become fairly fond of him. As for Annette, she had never in all her married life so striven to help her husband as in the last few months, when she had seen that he was troubled and suspected that he was engaged in wrongdoing. All her pity, all her loyalty as a wife, had risen within her. She had gradually abandoned the attitude of reserve which she had maintained toward him ever since that first unfortunate experience in Washington so long ago. She reproached herself, as the good always do, for not having been better. Had she given him more of her confidence and sought his more she might now be in a position to help him—or at least to sympathize with his trouble, whatever it might be. But her conscience should never upbraid her again for want of sympathy and tenderness to him. He might tell her of his perplexities, or he might keep them to himself—she would be all tenderness and softness to him. And then the hope was born and lived in her heart which every neglected wife has: that calamities of the soul as well as the heart might bring her husband once more to her side. For Annette had never ceased to love her husband, and with a woman loving spells forgiveness.

Crane dutifully delivered Senator Bicknell's and Thorndyke's messages and Annette's eyes sparkled with pleasure. She felt an increase of courage. She thought Crane must have seen that she had been a help, not a hindrance, to him, socially and personally, when she had been given a chance; and she meant to show him that she could hold her own in Washington as well as in Circleville.

A week or two passed in all the gay confusion of the beginning of the season in Washington. Thorndyke had watched his chance to call on Constance Maitland. Carefully avoiding her usual day at home, he had called on a peculiarly raw and disagreeable afternoon, very late, when he felt sure that she must have returned from her daily drive. He found her in her drawing-room, which was dusky, although it was but six o'clock, with a bright fire leaping high and making the charming room bright with its ruddy glow.

Constance, wrapped in rich, dark furs, her cheeks tingling with the fresh, cold air without, her eyes sparkling, was standing before the blazing fire. She was unaffectedly glad to see Thorndyke, and he felt that sense of quiet well-being which always came upon him when he was with her in her own house. They had much to talk about. Constance took off her furs and the long, rich cloak which enveloped her, and sat down on the deep, inviting sofa, and motioned Thorndyke to her side.

Among the persons they spoke of were Julian Crane and Annette. Thorndyke volunteered the suggestion that Crane was passing through some sort of a crisis—he was so changed, so silent where he was formerly talkative, so full of vague exultation and of equally vague depression. Thorndyke had seen Annette and the children; Annette had asked to be remembered to Miss Maitland, and Constance replied that she should call at once to see Mrs. Crane. She was not particularly interested in Julian Crane's crisis, except that she said that he ought to be more attentive to his wife.

But soon the conversation got down to the you and I—the books each had read, the thoughts each had pondered, the places each had seen. Constance had remained continuously at Malvern Court from June until late in November. She had had a succession of house parties during the summer, but in the golden autumn she had been quite alone.

"It was the sweetest, the most peaceful life you can imagine," she said thoughtfully. "All the world was shut out—except Virginia cousins—but I even escaped most of them. All day I was out in the woods and lanes, riding or driving or walking, and in the evening, with a wood fire, a book, a piano and a lamp, it was company enough, yet it was solitude itself. It was like Omar's shady tree and loaf of bread and jug of wine and book of verse."

"And 'Thou,'" added Thorndyke under his breath. He was watching her with a silent rapture which possessed him on meeting her after an absence. She surely had the softest and sweetest voice in the world, and those charming tricks of pronunciation—she called solitude "solee-tude" and piano "pe-arno," and was quite unconscious of it, and bitterly denied any difference between her speech and Thorndyke's. Constance was conscious of the adoring look in Thorndyke's eyes; she had heard the one suggestive word—perhaps it was that which caused a happy smile to flicker for a moment on her lips, revealing the faint, elusive dimple in her cheek—but she continued as if she had neither heard nor seen nor understood:

"I have heard about the solitude there is in crowds, but I never could find it so. I am so dreadfully sociable—Southern and Creole French, you know—that I always find troops of friends and acquaintances in a crowd. But in that solitary old country house in the autumn—that, if you please, was to be alone."

"You seem to have a passion for solitude," said Thorndyke rather crossly.

"Oh, no, only a taste for it at times. I never contemplated with pleasure a solitary life, and I have a horror of a lonely old age."

What did she mean? Was she proposing to him? Thorndyke was a good deal staggered by this speech from the lady of his secret love.

The time sped fast with them, and both of them started when a neighboring clock struck seven. Constance rose at once.

"I must go and dress for dinner at once, and you—you will remain?"

Such an idea had never entered Thorndyke's brain before, but in half a quarter of a second he had accepted.

"Of course," said Constance airily, picking up her muff and putting her bare hands in it, "it's very improper for you and me to dine together without others, but we have reached that comfortable age when we can commit all sorts of improprieties in perfect safety. It is a fine thing to grow old."

"That thought almost reconciles me to the loss of my hair," replied Thorndyke. "You will excuse my afternoon clothes, of course—since you have asked me to stay."

"Certainly. And out of consideration for your feelings I shall make only a demi-toilette."

Presently they were seated at a small round table and Scipio was serving a dainty little dinner. How young they felt! There was no débutante or fledgling youth present to remind them that Time had meddled with their hair and complexions, no elderly persons to claim them as pertaining to middle age. Thorndyke had rarely been more exhilarated in his life. There would be a morrow—nothing was changed by these stray hours of happiness—but still they were hours of happiness. As for Constance, she was radiant with pleasure, and was at no pains to conceal it. Thorndyke, it is true, always found misery and disappointment waiting for him at his lodgings whenever he returned from Constance's house, but they could not frighten off those occasional sweet hours which bloomed like snowdrops in a barren and frosted field.

One of the first visits that Constance paid was to Annette Crane. As Thorndyke had seen anxiety written all over Crane's personality, so Constance saw that Annette was not wholly at ease. But she was unaffectedly glad to see Constance, and soon returned the visit. Crane did not accompany her. He was beginning to feel a species of resentment toward Constance. Why, although he had told her of the comforting and sustaining power she had for him, had she chosen to treat him exactly as she treated all other men, except the few whom she chose to favor outrageously? Why, when she showed him any consideration, was Annette the obvious cause? Self-love was beginning to do for Crane what conscience had failed to do—emancipate him from his admiration for a woman other than his wife.

A day or two after reaching Washington Crane had left a card for Senator Bicknell. When Senator Bicknell returned the visit Crane, luckily, was not at home, and the Senator paid his call on Annette and enjoyed it very much. He had said to her at leaving:

"Remember, Mrs. Crane, you promised to dine with me many times in Washington, so that I may repeat, as far as possible, that pleasant day at Circleville."

"I am prepared to fulfill my promise," replied Annette, smiling, "but I hope you will give me a better dinner than I gave you."

"More kickshaws, perhaps, but nothing better. My dear lady, you must remember the difference between a gourmand and a gourmet. One—the gourmand—is a crude product, and would prefer my cook. The gourmet, who is a critic by profession, would certainly prefer yours."

It was arranged that Annette and Crane should dine with the Senator to meet a large party the next week. If Crane should be found to have made an engagement, Annette was to notify the Senator.

But he had made none. When he returned from the House that evening at six o'clock Annette told him of the Senator's visit and invitation, and, as ever since the summer, as soon as Senator Bicknell's name was mentioned a look of guilt and shame came upon Crane's expressive and mobile face. There was, however, no ground for declining, and besides, had he not agreed to keep on the best possible terms with Senator Bicknell until—until the time came to betray him? And as he would be obliged to meet Senator Bicknell socially many times in the two years he would be plotting against him, Crane had no object in avoiding him now—but, in meeting him, Crane had the grace to suffer pain.

On the night of the dinner Annette, arrayed in her white crêpe, was among the prettiest women present. It was a very large dinner, extremely magnificent, and made up of important persons, but Annette Crane was by no means unobserved or unadmired. Crane was forced to see that. She was placed near to Senator Bicknell, and he paid her a degree of kind attention which would have been flattering to any woman.

When the dinner was over and the gentlemen were about to join the ladies in the superb Louis Seize drawing-room, Senator Bicknell whispered to Crane as they passed from the Louis Quatorze dining-room, "Remain half an hour after the others leave."

Crane started—had the Senator heard anything? He reassured himself by remembering that the Senator would not attack him, an invited guest, and in the presence of his wife. But the thought of a private interview with Senator Bicknell on any subject was disquieting to Crane.

When the last carriage had driven off and only Crane and Annette remained Senator Bicknell said:

"Come into my den, and as I propose to take Mrs. Crane into my confidence, on account of the extraordinary political capacity she manifested on my visit to Circleville, I shall ask her to let us smoke while I unfold a scheme to you."

The den was a small, luxurious room, in the Louis Quinze style, and fit to harbor Madame Pompadour herself. It was shaded by opalescent lamps, Turkish rugs covered the parquetry floor, pictures and bric-à-brac worthy of a palace were to be found there. Some people thought that the Senator's den was one of the causes of the weakening of his political power. Many rural legislators reckoned his "fixin's" as wicked, and were only reconciled by hearing of the prices paid by the Senator for Percheron horses and Jersey heifers. The Senator did not care a rap for either Percherons or Jerseys, and scarcely knew a Percheron horse from a Jersey cow, but it was a concession to the rural statesmen, and he wisely reckoned these bucolic luxuries in his political expenses. Seated before a fire of aromatic wood Senator Bicknell, offering a choice cigar to Crane and taking one himself, began to unfold his scheme. Annette, her white gown brought into high relief by a ruby lamp swinging overhead, sat silent and listened. She did not, apparently, watch her husband's face, but she knew every expression which passed over it, and could have interpreted it, as well as every tone of his voice.

"To come to the point," said the Senator blandly, "I am one of a number of gentlemen interested in a deal of about two million acres of land in Texas. We have had an offer to sell our holdings and we have determined to accept. Part of the purchase money is to be paid in cash, and there is also a transfer of property contemplated for about a million of dollars. Our attorneys are in Chicago, but meanwhile we want a man to go down to Texas once in a while and see how things are coming on, and attend to some matters of detail which I will state later. The whole matter will hardly be settled under a year. We propose to pay a fee of ten thousand dollars and a small commission. I should say there was something like twenty thousand dollars in it for the right man. Several, of course, have been suggested; but you know, Mr. Crane, I am like John Adams was about New England men—there never was an office existing or created during John Adams' time that he hadn't a constituent ready for it. So, when the necessity for a man for this work became evident, I suggested I had a constituent, likewise a colleague in the lower House, who could manage the job if he would, and mentioned your name."

WHEN HE BEGAN HE SCARCELY KNEW WHETHER HE COULD GET THROUGH A SINGLE SENTENCE

Twenty thousand dollars! It seemed to Crane an enormous sum. Then he heard Senator Bicknell's voice continuing:

"It would oblige you to take a trip to Texas during the Christmas recess, and you would have to spend two or three months down there next summer; but I am persuaded we shall reach an early adjournment, so it would not necessarily interfere with you in any way. Besides, it might be useful to you in other ways, and it would be decidedly useful to me. It would show the people in the State that you and I are working well together in harness, and, Heaven knows, I need some assurances of the sort to be given! That scoundrel, Governor Sanders, has been knifing me right and left all over the State, and I look for trouble both at the convention next summer and if I am up for reëlection, a year and a half from now."

Crane remained silent a minute or two, and grew pale. Senator Bicknell thought he was a little overcome at what was really a very magnificent offer to a man in his situation.

Annette, who had taken in with perfect intelligence all Senator Bicknell was saying, kept her eyes away from her husband. If he were in league with Governor Sanders——

Crane was not only overcome, he was overwhelmed. The thought came crashing through his brain: "This is the man I am secretly trying to destroy." Every word the Senator uttered seemed to have the force of a thousand voices. "That scoundrel, Sanders"—Yes, Sanders was a scoundrel, but he had never pretended to be a friend of Senator Bicknell's, nor was he indebted to the Senator for anything. Their warfare had been open and above board, while his—— Crane could have cried aloud in his torture as he recalled the treacherous alliance into which he had entered. His head was reeling, he heard the Senator's voice afar off, the ruby light falling upon Annette in her shining white gown seemed to be a hundred miles away. Yet, with a calm voice, and with only a slight tremor of his hands, Crane answered:

"I thank you from the bottom of my heart. You have made me a very splendid offer. Twenty thousand dollars to a rural Congressman is a great deal of money, and as for the confidence you show in me, I feel it more than I can express."

He was conscious that he was displaying wonderful nerve. When he began to speak he scarcely knew whether he could get through with a single sentence, but he had spoken with tolerable ease and composure. Of course, he must appear as if he would accept. He could not, on the spur of the moment, devise any plausible refusal. He must have time to think—but of course it was utterly impossible that he should consider the matter for a moment. He was not yet bad enough for that. If only he had remained honest! For nothing brings home a man's evildoing to him more than when he sees the result in a concrete form. His wrongdoing comes out of the regions of mind and morals, and becomes a tangible and visible thing, like an incarnate devil. He realizes his sin when he receives the wages of sin.

Annette listened to every note in Crane's voice, and heard there—falseness. He was not happy, not grateful for the offer. But she, at least, thanked Senator Bicknell from the bottom of her heart for his kind wish to benefit them. When he finished speaking she leaned toward him and laid her hand on his, while her eyes glowed with a lambent light:

"I thank you—I thank you not only for my husband and myself, but for our little children. It means an education for them—many things their father and I have longed to give them when they are older, but feared we could not."

Senator Bicknell raised her hand to his lips and kissed it gallantly.

"My dear lady," he said, "I am glad to oblige your husband, and I believe he will render a full equivalent for whatever he makes out of this transaction. And I have frankly told him that I think our coöperation in business will be a good thing for me politically. But the day I spent at your house, the kind hospitality to your husband's friend, the sweetness of your home, the excellent behavior of your children, quickened very much the interest I felt in Mr. Crane, and it was a factor in my effort to serve him. Come now, Crane," said the Senator, tapping him on the shoulder, "all I ask is that when I am up for reëlection, if you choose to contest the election with me you will please leave Mrs. Crane at home. If ever she enters into the campaign I am lost."

"She will enter the campaign, but it will be for you," replied Annette.

Crane then pulled himself together, and again expressed his appreciation of Senator Bicknell's kindness, and asked when they could meet to go into details of the affair—a meeting at which Crane was determined to decline the benefits offered him.

"Oh, some day next week—I'll let you know when I hear from Chicago," replied the Senator; and after a little more desultory talk the Cranes rose to go.

"I took the liberty of sending your carriage away and my chauffeur will take you home," said the Senator, mindful of attentions to a pretty and pleasing woman.

In a little while Annette and Crane were seated in the Senator's automobile and rushing through the frosty December night toward home.

Persistent Pot-Hunting

GOVERNOR STANLEY, of Kansas, was once so pestered by office-seekers that he found it necessary publicly to make the statement that, in view of the exceedingly numerous applications for office he had received through the mails, he should be unable to give any attention to them, much less afford any hope of success to the various applicants.

In the course of a few days after making the statement in question the Governor received the following note:

"My dear Governor: I understand that you have said that you were going to take a week off to destroy the pile of letters asking for jobs. If everything else is gone, then, my dear Governor, I should like the job of tearing up the letters."

Poor Richard Junior's Philosophy

¶ All real success is in making one's way.

¶ Most self-made men would put in a college education if they had the job to do over again.

¶ That Chicago millionaire is still after the ideal servant girl, but of course she left last week.

¶ In swinging the circle President Roosevelt seems to have worked a loop around a renomination.

¶ As usual this is the grouching season of the man who wants the second-story front for the back gable price.

¶ The present population of the United States is about 80,000,000, a few of whom have not yet written novels.

¶ It has cost a lot, but Mr. Carnegie has reached the proud moment when he can get his speeches printed in full.

¶ The summer traveler who always has better food at home never offers a reasonable explanation as to why he left.

¶ To the bicycle face the automobile added goggles. If the flying-machine is going to do worse, let us be satisfied with what we have.

¶ Uncle Sam exports over a billion dollars' worth a year, but he maintains the balance of trade by keeping Mr. Rockefeller home.

¶ Fighting a way to the refreshment table is one of the joys of a big American crowd, showing again that none but the brave deserve the fare.

¶ It is proposed to start a hall of fame for the men who really never loved but one girl. It will require a very small hall and there will not be a quorum.

The Professions and the Callings

AT THE recent national convention of the American Medical Association at New Orleans, Doctor Billings, the president, said: "This country needs about twenty-five hundred medical students annually, and the medical schools are turning out between ten thousand and twelve thousand." We are told by distinguished judges and leading members of the bar that the supply of lawyers is fully twice the demand, with a gentle hint that a famine of legal graduates for a few years would not be a disastrous hardship. In the ministry the returns are conflicting. Some of the denominations report an abundance, but many others have empty pulpits, the small salaries being cited as a cause. There is some question as to whether or not journalism is a profession — Dr. St. Clair McKelway, an eloquent authority, in a speech the other day, "hoped" it soon would be; but there is no doubt at all that every publication office has a long waiting list, and the number of applicants grows with each college and university commencement.

Turning from the professions, we find that the callings resemble their names in the calls they are making upon the educated ranks for trained young men and women. Three presidents of great universities have within the past half-year complained that the inroads of the industries upon their ranks of students and instructors had become serious and that they could not furnish one-half as many desirable workers as were needed in the applied arts alone. Four of the scientific schools say that this year's graduates will step at once into lucrative employment, and more could do so if they were at hand. In the tremendous developments of the past decade nothing has been more significant than the general competition for educated workmen. This wonderful country has outgrown the mere scramble for quantity and is now racing for quality, and in that contest science and skill and originality are of the utmost value.

One happy result of the new conditions is the realignment of the social order. The professional men no longer monopolize the inner circles of culture and aristocracy. The man who does things has taken a place higher than the man who simply belongs to a profession. Neither law nor theology nor medicine carries a patent right to a finer nobility than any other department of education, effort or investigation. A big lot of nonsense has been knocked out of society, and the field of endeavor has been widened and made more attractive to all the earnest workers of the world.

We have all been preaching the inherent and essential nobility of work ever since printing became common, but it has remained for the truly golden age to break down the old barriers and to make opportunity free and the reward honest and right. It is folly, of course, to think that the big places in any of the professions are all filled and that greater prizes are not to be won, but the important fact is that the professions do not enjoy their old monopolies, that there are other desirable proficiencies, compensations and victories, and that the credits are of more equal merit in the eyes and appreciations of the times.

And in this new order the engineer who plans and builds a fine work is a bit more consequential in the public esteem than the eloquent representative of the law who delivers the dedicatory address. We can keenly enjoy the satire of a paragraph which went the rounds the other day, saying that in the unveiling of a certain monument the name of the sculptor was actually mentioned ahead of the master of ceremonies.

The Bear and the Dragon

SENATOR BEVERIDGE'S articles in THE SATURDAY EVENING POST on Russia in Manchuria have fully prepared our readers for the latest great international development. His accuracy of statement and of judgment has been confirmed in general and in detail.

It is highly improbable that our Government will interfere with Russia's age-old program. England will hardly be able to persuade us that we ought to spend thousands of millions of money and thousands of precious American lives in promoting her Asiatic interests. No matter what flag flies over any part of Asia, we shall get our legitimate share of the trade there, just as we are to-day getting our share — and a very big share — of the trade of the various European countries. Your Uncle Samuel gives his undivided attention to keeping the best kind of a general store he knows how to keep; and he doesn't send soldiers but drummers out to gather in the orders.

Cut Out the Educational Frills

A RICH self-made Chicago man has put himself to a great deal of trouble to write a book tending to show by statistics and other facts that for purposes of success in business the college education is a failure. Many of the college people are laughing at him — and beyond question he does go to the extreme of an extreme. At the same time the man is honest, and the sound idea in his book will bear fruit.

There is a theory that the body can be properly developed only by forms of manual labor which are otherwise absolutely useless. Hence a boy scorns to learn farming or gardening or a trade, and spends years in studying football, handball, polo and billiards. There is a theory that the mind can be properly developed only by forms of mental labor which are otherwise absolutely useless.

Let the ordinary college graduate honestly answer this question: Except for "making a front," how much use have your Latin and Greek, your analytical geometry and differential calculus, ever been to you?

The fact is that at the basis of much "sport" and much "higher education" lies the notion that there is superiority in ability to do, or plausibly to profess ability to do, what the mass of mankind has not had the leisure to learn to do.

As the run of humanity is secretly snobbish, the craving for ornaments that are supposed to constitute the "gentleman," for the useless hands and impeding frilleries that are supposed to constitute the "lady," would perish indefinitely but for one unsurmountable fact. That is — more and more the world is getting to be a place where only the worker, only the lusty, alive "hustler" can maintain a foothold. And the colleges will have to recognize the fact and to drop their beloved, moth-eaten trappings of mediævalism.

The Civilization Promoters

KINGS and Emperors over in Europe are running about, visiting each other; millions of dollars are being shot away and otherwise squandered; and the shallow sycophants of the European press are recording the "vast increase of international comity as the result of the meeting of their majesties." As these visitings are costing us nothing, as the clamor of cannon and the hurly-burly of saluting soldiery are too far away to disturb our slumbers, we of America can have no cause for complaint.

The peoples of the earth are slowly coming to understand one another, to grasp the great common-sense truths of the brotherhood of man and the folly of fighting. But the visitings of princes and presidents are not helping this on. One of the most wearisome ironies of history is the oft-repeated spectacle of Kings kissing on the eve of their subjects leaping at each other's throats. The way for prince or peasant, for president or private citizen to promote civilization is by setting a good example and wasting or encouraging the waste of as little money as possible — especially of other people's hard earnings.

The King of Italy "blowing in" hundreds of thousands of lire, wrung from wretched Italian peasants, to entertain Edward, who left a country where one of every four of his English subjects is a pauper, or to give a good time to William, millions of whose German subjects envy the domestic animals, which are at least well fed; to call this civilization-promoting is to indulge in one of those satiric figures of speech which, as Bunyan said, "make the fancy chuckle while the heart doth ache."

The Pitfalls of the Law

IN HIS will Washington provides for the settlement of a contest, "if unhappily any should arise," by three arbitrators, and says that they—

"Shall, unfettered by law or legal constructions, declare their sense of the testator's intention."

Thus, even in Washington's day, there was among men of sense and experience a strong aversion to courts and to lawyers — in cases where justice was wanted. And this aversion was never so strong as at the present time when the lawyers have had another hundred years in which to set traps and dig pitfalls all round the throne of justice, and to erect toll-gates at every avenue leading to it. Yet the whole reason for the existence of court and law — and lawyer — is that justice may be had by all, especially by the many — the poor and the humble.

Our courts, our judges, are in the main sound and just. The trouble is with the lawyers and the lawyer-made laws. In a day when might employs a lawyer permanently at a large salary as soon as he shows more than ordinary talent, is it likely that legislatures filled with lawyers will move effectively to right the wrong?

Why the People Fear the Trusts

REGIMENTS of arguments for capital-trusts and labor-trusts are hurled at the people of this country, but they continue to be suspicious, continue to listen attentively to any one who comes forward with a plausible "remedy" for what the trust-advocates say is not disease but a national development of healthy growth. What is the reason for this tenacious, not-to-be-reasoned-with popular instinct? The usual answer is "Popular ignorance." But that is as shallow as it is easy. Analysis discloses the truth, the bedrock basis for popular dread and suspicion. It is expressed in the one word: Power.

The people of this democracy know that their liberty rests upon equality, that in our social scheme no man and no group of men is permitted to have irresponsible, unendable power. The corporation has always been sharply watched by the people because it looked like a something possessed of real power. The combination, that amazing expansion of the corporation idea, is suspected and dreaded because it is obviously a depository of genuine power — the brains and muscles and capital of thousands intrusted to one man who is in no way responsible to any one or checked by any one, so long as he earns dividends and interest, no matter how. And for obvious reasons this applies equally, will presently apply as forcefully, to the labor "combine."

"No other depositories of power than the people themselves," says Jefferson, "have ever yet been found which did not end in converting to their own profit the earnings of those committed to their charge." And this the people believe — and can't be reasoned out of by plausibilities or philanthropics.

Saving the Wasted Year

The Need for an Earlier Start in Life Studies

By David Starr Jordan

IT HAS long been recognized that a four-years' college course, after the course in the secondary school, and preceding the course in professional training, holds the young man a very long time in school. Few men are prepared for college, as matters stand, before the age of seventeen or eighteen. Few graduate under twenty-one or twenty-two, and the professional school demands the years to twenty-four, twenty-five or twenty-six. After this follows another year or two of petty beginnings, and by the time the young man is fairly under way he has reached the age of thirty. If from ill health, hesitation of policy, or for any other reason the college course is delayed, the entrance on professional life becomes correspondingly later. By this process the ancient rule of health, "Rise early, before you are twenty-five, if possible," is persistently violated.

There is no advantage in merely putting in time in college at the expense of serious work outside. Every day in school should justify itself. Wherever time can be saved without sacrifice of results it is a real gain in education.

The college course has been systematically lengthened within the past twenty years. It has been made longer that it may be enriched and made effective. To this end, subject after subject of an elementary character has been thrown backward to the preparatory schools. In this there are some advantages. The college with more advanced pupils becomes more enlightened. It offers a broader range of subjects, and touches the interests of a much larger number of men.

On the other hand, students are often kept in their local high schools until they are tired of the place and tired of the work. Higher education starts when a boy leaves home and begins to depend on himself. Because the high schools have an inadequate and over-feminine teaching force, very many boys who might have been helped by a college education abandon the school long before they are ready to enter college. There is a constant pressure on the preparatory school to undertake more work and to do it more rapidly. The preparatory school tries to do this with some success, and also with serious drawbacks. The greatest disadvantage is that the results are tested as to quantity rather than quality of work done.

The college has not yet devised a qualitative scale of admission—not how much the student knows, but what is the nature of his ability and training should be the test of preparation. The college ought to insist that the student shall be able to go on with the higher work successfully, rather than that he should have to his credit such and such subjects or their equivalents. But it is easier to make numerical estimates than to test the student's mettle. It is easier to measure cordwood than culture, and our tests of preparation are based on the method used in estimating cordwood.

The college should receive men whenever they are ready for its freedom and ready to do its work. If it can devise a sure method, it may "dip down" into the lower schools and take their best students when they have reached fitness for independent study.

To Abolish the Senior Year

HAVING turned the freshman year of twenty years ago over to the preparatory schools, the college can now do correspondingly more in its senior year. Shall it use this time for general culture or for professional training? Here the pressure to yield this year to the professional schools makes itself felt. In America the professional schools have vainly tried to train men who have no foundation of knowledge or discipline; to make physicians and lawyers out of men with neither scientific knowledge nor literary culture. This has failed, and in its failure has brought all American professions, except engineering, into disrepute.

The reputable professional schools demand, or will soon demand, a college education as a prerequisite for entrance. No man with less training than this can do specialized work decently. The college course represents a degree of enlightenment and a kind of training without which professional success and usefulness are not possible. The extension of the elective system has enabled the college to meet the needs of all kinds of men of brains and force.

To shorten the college course to three years is to yield the last year to the professional schools, and these sorely need the additional time.

Another influence tending in this direction comes from the German educational system. In Germany, the local high school, or gymnasium, takes, let us say, two of the years we give to the college. The professional school, or university, takes the rest. The university gives no general culture or general training. The gymnasium gives nothing else, and its curriculum is as rigid as that of the university is free.

Paring Down the College Course

WHILE German educators are considering the possible introduction of the college as an intermediate between the gymnasium and the university, there is in America a tendency toward the obliteration of the college, by merging its higher years into the university, its lower into the preparatory school.

It is true that in the gymnasia students get on faster than in our high schools and preparatory schools.

The German student is as far along in his studies at sixteen as the American at eighteen. This is due to the fact that American life makes more outside demands on boys than life in Germany does. The American boy is farther along in self-reliance and in knowledge of the world at sixteen than the German at eighteen. The American college freshman, especially if brought up in the West, knows a thousand things outside of his books, and more useful, because more true than the things most of his books contain. He can ride, drive, swim, row, hunt, take care of horses, play games, run an engine, or attend to some form of business, while the German boy cannot even blacken his own shoes.

As education is no perquisite of the rich, the American boy has very likely been obliged to earn the money he spends on his own education. To do this he loses time in scholastic marks, but in the long run this is clear gain, provided that he does not abandon his education. The boy who graduates at twenty-four is often more than three years ahead of the one who takes his bachelor's degree at twenty-one. To lose time in testing life is not a loss at all, and the American boy is the stronger for his early escape from leading strings. When his university training is over he is not merely learned; he is adequate, and the higher ideal of personal effectiveness supplements the German ideal of erudition, or the English ideal of personal culture.

It is proposed now to let a man graduate in three years, provided he can do four years' average work in that time. This is no new proposition and needs no discussion. Many men can do in three years more than the average man can in four. In many institutions, in most of those in the West, this privilege has been allowed for many years. If guarded from abuse, and the possibility of mere cramming is excluded, there can be no objection to it. In many institutions a man graduates whenever he has done the required work, and the propriety of this needs no argument.

But the average man cannot do the required work in less than four years. What shall we do for him? It is practicable to reduce the amount of work required for graduation. This would still leave the college course longer than it was twenty years ago, because so much more is now required for admission to college.

I do not believe that this is the best solution. It is better, I believe, to bring the elements of professional knowledge and the beginning of advanced research into the course itself. It is better to break down the barrier between the college and the university, by letting the university dip down into the college. For example, in making lawyers, the work in elementary law can be relegated to the college, as in making chemists we now teach elementary chemistry in the freshman year. In training physicians, the elementary work, physiology, general anatomy, histology, chemistry, should all be in the college course, and in making scientific men of any grade the senior year is none too early for the beginnings of scientific research. I believe that the four-years' college course offers a great advantage. It is now possible to offer the serious student before graduating the crowning value of the college course, something of the method of research. It is likewise possible to offer the elements of professional training inside the college course, and not as an affair wholly separate. In favor of this arrangement the following facts may be urged.

It is an advantage to college training to relate it to life. The sooner a man knows what he is to do in life and gets at it the better. This being admitted, the fuller the preparation the better, provided the final goal is always kept in view. To make a first-rate surgeon the scalpel should be in use from youth onward. It need not be used on the human body, but the methods of histology and anatomy should be learned early and never allowed to fall into disuse. To put an embryo physician through four years of classics and mathematics, and then to turn him suddenly into dissection and clinic, is to invite failure. He has learned nothing of research in his college course, his hand has grown clumsy and his power of observation is dulled. To be a good physician he should have turned his whole college course in that direction—not that he should have had less of literature and the humanities, but that these should aid science, not displace it.

The Problem of the Specialist

A YOUNG man makes a better lawyer if he is a law student throughout his college course, for six or seven years, not merely for three at the end. Elementary law is in no sense an advanced study. It has a natural place in the college curriculum, with just as much right as economics or the history of philosophy, and to the ordinary college course the universities should relegate elementary law, physiology, histology, comparative anatomy, and all forms of science which are elementary and fundamental to professional research. When this is done four years will be none too long for general training, and the professional departments will deal with men prepared to do serious work, men worthy of the advantages the best libraries and laboratories can have to offer. Then, if the time is to be shortened, the result can be reached by the higher demands of the professional schools. It is absurd to call the department of law "a graduate school" when half its students are engaged with the a b c of equity, a subject as elementary as plane geometry. Let elementary law go with elementary geometry. The advanced school can devote itself to advanced training, and a man who is to be a lawyer can think in terms of law throughout his college course. He will be a better lawyer for doing so, and his work being better related to life he will be in every other respect a better scholar on account of it.

Talks with a Kid Brother

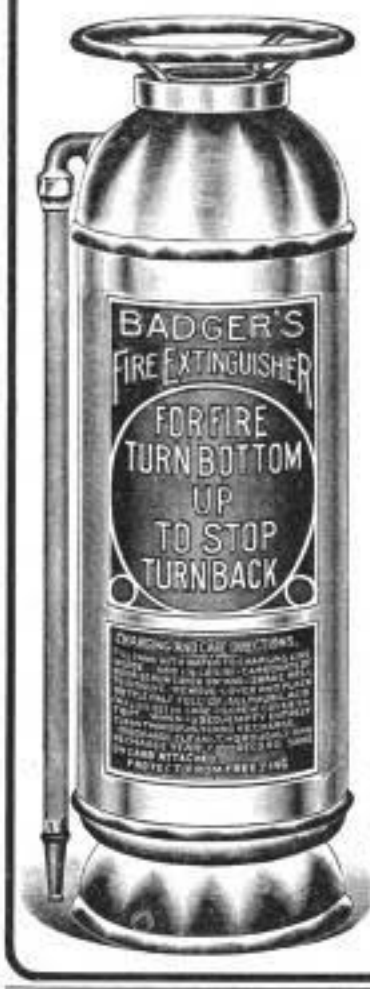
By Jesse Lynch Williams

The "Nicest Fellows"

WHEN I entered college I thought about half my classmates were freaks. Before graduation I found something to admire and a good deal to like in about all of them. Since then I've gone on the principle that a freak is a man I don't know. Familiarity breeds contempt—occasionally. But propinquity produces appreciation—more frequently.

Now, of course, I don't mean that every man you run up against is likely to prove just your sort. On the contrary, I will go so far as to say with Stevenson of an occasional type that bobs up now and then in business or play time—what was it Stevenson said of a certain prig? "I don't know what it is about that man, but somehow he arouses within me passions that would shame hell!" But these are merely the exceptions to prove the generalization that, however fastidious you may be, there are rather few human beings in this interesting world who are not worth knowing, and still fewer, however they grate upon you at times, who do not become more and more likable the better you become acquainted with them.

Every family is a unit. Each one of these classmates of yours represents a household which has just as well-established traditions and as much-worshiped Penates as in the ancient times, referred to in that open book there on the table which you ought to be reading now instead of indulging in the pleasure of hearing me talk. And of all the beneficial effects of college association, I sometimes think the best is that your moral, as well as your mental and social, horizon is broadened, your eyes are opened, your sympathies are extended by knowing and liking so many different sorts of fellows. Even if your family views of life and conduct are not modified, you are at least made to appreciate and tolerate the family views of other fellows. I do not say our way of looking at and doing things at home is not the best in the world, but, like almost every other family in the land, we are inclined to forget that there are other opinions, likewise regarded as the highest product of Christian civilization. Certainly it is worth while to take a look at other traditions, other Penates, other portraits—even though ours are, of course, the handsomest and most distinguished. Think of all the fellows who never would have the benefit of knowing—in the sense of understanding and appreciating—any but that small segment of society in which they happen to be born, if it were not for the propinquity and familiarity of college life. Take the case of young Dashwood.



Being a Philadelphian, Dashwood had been brought up to think it not only dangerous but wrong to know any but the sort of people his mother invited to her annual ball in January. When he came to college he quietly took for granted that he would receive his (Dashwood's) due just as he had at home from the boys at school, being Philadelphians. There was nothing arrogant about it; he was a rather modest fellow, a younger brother of superior Dashwoods; but he could not forget, even if he wanted to, that he, too, was a Dashwood. In this case it took more than mere hazing to readjust his ego; hazing he looked upon as a tribute to his being a Dashwood. "Naturally I have been horsed a good deal," he wrote home.

When the sophomores had finished with him he still went on the assumption that his own classmates would accord him what he considered no more than his just desserts—his full share, for instance, of the honors by popular election so dear to undergraduates. Why not? Had not the Dashwoods always been sought out for distinctions in Philadelphia? But would you believe it? many of these fellows had never heard of the Dashwoods before, and did not fancy the way this one said How-do-you-do. He was not even elected to the dance committee, though this was just the sort of thing he was suited for. All the earlier Dashwoods in college had been prominent socially, if in no other way.

His mother—she used to warn him every week against letting any but "the nicest fellows" cultivate his acquaintance—began to feel sorry, not for her Willie, of course, but grieved for the deplorable ignorance of his classmates who did not seem to know a Dashwood when they saw one. What was the college coming to! She was interested in the college; the Dashwoods had always honored it with their patronage.

But note what happened. This shows that not all the sturdy stuff in the Dashwood blood had been spilt in the historic struggle to prove that all men were born free and equal. Instead of throwing a bluff at liking his loneliness, and doing the proudly exclusive act, after the manner of some of his kind, it occurred to him that possibly the fault lay in himself instead of in his classmates.

"To be sure—why should they like me, anyway," he said, and "a great light broke in upon him," as the lady novelists say, and he saw himself and other boys as they really were and not as they seemed to be. Then he began cultivating the society of the quiet fellows who really counted; and gained it in time, when he deserved it. Became ambitious and industrious, took a high standing in his class, won respect by his independence, tried for some more honors, missed one or two, worked harder and earned several. By the time he was graduated last year he was one of the "big men" of the college, as I believe you call them, and withal a great upholder of the democratic spirit. That is the most interesting phase of his development to me. I understand that he used to take down home for the week-end not those classmates whom his sisters would call the "nicest men," but friends of his who he thought would most enjoy and benefit by a Sunday at his mother's very complete country place, worthy fellows in most cases, but sometimes rather astonishing. His sisters used to laugh about it with their friends and blame it to his sociological fad, but his mother took the blow pretty hard, wondered which side of the family was to blame for the taint of common blood, and prayed for patience till the time of her son's graduation—with which was to begin the gradual reformation of the prodigal.

It would be diverting to observe how this reformation business proceeds. Sooner or later, I suppose, he will be reimprisoned in Philadelphia society. But whether his mother makes him live down his past or not, he has learned a few things at college he could have acquired at no other place and in no other way, and they can't hurt him, whatever he decides to do with his God-given life.

You can see all sorts of people in travel, you can find out about their history and habits in books, but what you cannot get by travel or reading is the close, personal touch, the intimate first-hand impression. You can only get at the personal equation by personal contact. All of which might have been summed up by repeating that the best study of man is man, except that I wanted to bring out the idea that, owing to the conditions of your life and the age of those living it, you have a great opportunity, here on this campus, in these dormitories, for laying down a good working foundation of a knowledge of human nature—including your own. Do not miss the opportunity. When you get settled down in the world most of you will fence yourselves off from one another by office hours, business principles, sophistication and wives. Now is the time.

I'm reminding you of this, because, you see, you are by way of becoming one of "the big men" of the college yourself, and having arrived by a different route, I sometimes wonder if you are getting all that's coming to you out of your college course. No, I'm not going to jump on you for catching that condition in Physics. That's shop, and I promised not to talk shop any more. (Instead, I write it to you once a week.)

What do I refer to? Well, Little Tompkins isn't one of the "big men," like you; I know; he didn't even make a club, but his brother is a dear friend of mine, and if the kid Tompkins is anything like George, I'm sorry you've missed each other. What's that? You say you have nothing against Tommy? A nice little chap? Only you haven't time this year for anything. Well, I hardly hoped that George's brother and my brother would hit it off together. Somehow the younger generation of friends seldom do. It's like the marriages that young mothers plan together over their babies' clothes; they never come off. But remember that just because you happen to be in with the important push is not necessarily a proof that you deserved it any more than Tompkins. You may consider yourself in your quiet, carefully unconceited way an awfully nice fellow, but how do you know that Tompkins, or that quiet poler in the seat next to yours in chapel, does not consider himself a still nicer fellow. Possibly you'll think so, too, eventually. Who knows? You may be asking Tompkins for a job some day, like Henry Haskell, the great baseball player. He was a very big man in college, so big that it took him years to get out, it seems. After graduation he kept on coming back to coach the team, kept on being known as "Haskell, the great catcher"—and as nothing else. It's hard for you to realize it from where you stand, with your nose up against athletics, so to speak, but it's rather chagrining to a grown man who has been out of college a tenth of a century to be known only for what he once was as a yawping undergraduate.

Well, in desperation, Haskell dropped in at Alfred Mortimer's one day and, after waiting his turn in line, was shown into Mortimer's private office. They weren't friends, but had been in college at the same time.

"For Heaven's sake, Mortimer," said Haskell in his direct manner, "isn't there something you can give me to do to earn a living?"

Now, Mortimer was a very inconspicuous looking little man and had a soft, thin voice. "Why, Mr. Haskell," he said with a queer gleam in his eye, "I didn't suppose you knew my name. You never seemed to be aware of my existence in college."

"But that was in college, Mortimer," said Haskell, blushing. "I am now," he added with a smile, and looked around at the expensive Wall Street office furniture.

Then the soft, thin voice replied: "Mr. Haskell, I don't suppose you remember this but I have never forgotten it. One day when I first arrived at college I was passing inoffensively down the street, minding my business and not saying a word to anybody. You stuck your head out of an eating-club window and said to me, without a smile or any introduction, 'You d——d freshman!' and closed the window; I had never seen you before. Do you remember?"

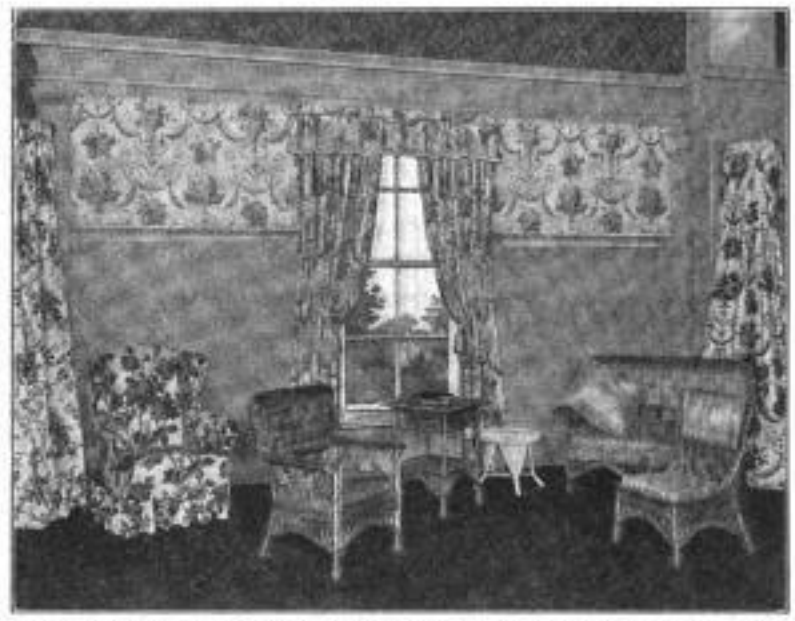
"No, I don't recall it," said Haskell, laughing uncomfortably.

"I do. I resolved that I should revenge myself some day. This seems to be the day, Mr. Haskell. When would you care to get to work?"

Haskell took the position, and they eventually became the best of friends.

Now, it isn't necessary for me to remind you how I should feel if I heard of a brother of mine deliberately "getting in with" anybody for what he could "get out of it." That is the limit—not so much because of the lie in it, but because it is the prostitution of friendship, and friendship is one of the best things we are allowed on earth.

I remember once when a man, who might better be called a person, left the room where a gang of us were loafing. "Yes," said the owner of the room in answer to the eloquent silence which followed the closing of the door, "I admit that he is an unmitigated ass, but I only cultivate him because he may be useful to me later in New York society." This, by the way, produced another eloquent silence. I, for one, had ingenuously assumed that our host was so invariably decent to the ass because so few of the rest of us ever were. He was a charming, generous man, in many ways a noble fellow, but after that I never felt perfectly comfortable in his presence again. I couldn't help wondering how I was to be useful to him.



An Honest Answer

DURING his recent visit to Washington Andrew Carnegie had occasion to send a messenger boy with a note to the chairman of the committee charged with the inaugural ceremonies in connection with the new Carnegie Library in that city. As the distance from the hotel to the library is considerable, the boy was obliged to consume the larger part of two hours before he could return with the answer. When he had come back the millionaire asked how much the boy charged for his services. The lad stuttered badly. "Fi-fi-fi-fifteen c-c-cents," was his gasping reply.

"Why didn't you make it a quarter?" asked Mr. Carnegie.

"B-b-b-b-b-because," painfully stammered the boy, "I c-c-c-c-c-could-could-couldn't s-s-s-say it."

Shortening the College Course

By Dr. William Mathews

ONE of the weaknesses of Americans is a love of "short cuts." Short cuts in travel, short cuts in education, short cuts to the learned professions, to mercantile callings, to wealth and to distinction are craved by thousands of young men who have no conception of the necessity or the time and toil required for laying broad and deep the foundations of their life-work. An extreme example of this was the woman in a Western State who wrote to a college professor, asking if he did not think she would be qualified to teach elocution if she should go there and take twelve lessons in the art.

Till recently the heads of our great schools have stoutly antagonized the "short-cut" theories of education. Great, therefore, was the surprise of American educators when the statement was made by the newspapers that the president, not of a young college, but of one of the oldest and most celebrated American universities—Columbia—had proposed a shortening of the college course, at least in some cases, and conferring the degree of A. B. on young men who have studied there but two years. The main reason given for the change is, we believe, that a young man who spends four years in college, before entering the professional school, is too late in entering upon a professional career.

Why is it too late, if a man enters upon a professional career at twenty-three, twenty-four or twenty-five years of age? Many of the ablest men in the country have graduated from college at later ages than these. The names of two able college presidents, and one very able president of a theological seminary, occur to us, who completed their college course at twenty-eight. An Englishman is quite content to enter upon a professional career at thirty. One of the chief justices of England did not begin the study of law till he was thirty-seven years old. Is it because the student cannot wait so long before beginning to earn money? Then let him enter college earlier, or shorten his professional course, rather than abridge his education as a man.

Cut down the college course to two years and it would be the merest mockery to call it a "liberal education." It has long been a complaint that, owing to the rapid growth of science the college curriculum is so loaded with studies that even in four years the student finds it difficult to master them. What, then, can be expected of him if he has but two years for the purpose? The advocates of shorter courses seem utterly to forget that time is an essential element in the acquisition of knowledge and in mental training.

If there is anything certain in education it is that, to make our acquisitions our own, and hold them fast in the memory, a period sufficiently long for the formation of mental associations between the newly-acquired information and that previously possessed must elapse, so that the new ideas may be linked with the old by suggestive chains. No new knowledge is really our own until it has been so turned over and over in the mind that it is not merely added to the old, but interpenetrates it, so that the old can scarcely come into "the sphere of consciousness" without bringing the new within it. In short, "education is growth, and growth depends, not on acquisition, but on assimilation;" and assimilation is a slow process which cannot be hurried.

In view of all this, we rejoice that Harvard University has announced that it has no intention of permitting its requirements for the degree of B. A. to be lowered. "It has no sympathy," says President Eliot in his last annual report, "with any efforts to lower the standard of the degree of bachelor of arts, or to substitute for it an inferior degree. . . . It proposes to uphold the standard of that degree by all appropriate legislation within its own walls and by the effect of its admission examinations on the secondary schools, and it has already done all that a university can do to support the primary degrees in arts and sciences, by requiring such a degree for admission to its principal professional schools."

After such an emphatic declaration by the oldest, largest and most influential university in the land, there is little danger that the scheme to transfer the American college into a mere way-station on the road to the professional school will be successful.

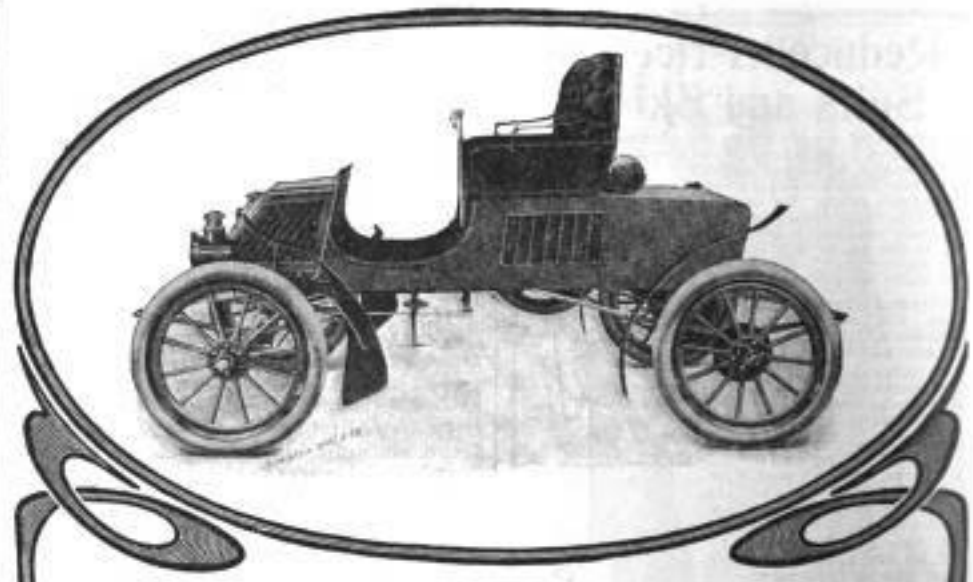
Literary Folk Their Ways and Their Work



HIS OWN FAMILIAR FRIEND — Is it right to put him in a book? Professor Linn answers.

¶ The same problem confronts the author, whether his intention leans toward adventure or philosophy—that is, whether he means simply to tell a story or to throw fresh light upon some one of the questions that life asks us all. That problem is, how to make the characters sufficiently vital to hold the interest of the reader. With this problem Stevenson had to struggle in writing Treasure Island, no less than Hardy in writing Tess of the D'Urbervilles, although the one book is only a thrilling roadside tale and the other a contribution to the doctrines of fatalism. No doubt a certain class of readers is satisfied, it is true, with the mere clash of swords and rattle of musketry; and there may be a few chilled souls who can enjoy a book written in accordance with the principles of a game at chess, where wooden figures are skilfully moved about to secure the attainment of a predetermined end. But most of us, even in our historical novels, want a man behind the gun; most of us insist that if life is a game, it is not a game of chess but a game of football. Granted the author's problem, then, the next question is, where is he to find his characters? Is he—to make matters specific—justified in sketching his friends and acquaintances? Yes, and no.

We may as well take for granted that no man was ever so great a genius as to imagine a new trait of character. If any man did imagine one, its presentation would necessarily be ineffective, because no reader would recognize it, and therefore it would be, in the best sense, untrue to life. That character is most effective which makes the widest appeal; which is seen to be kinsman to the greatest number of us. We sympathize with Hamlet, because in him Shakespeare shows us with almost superhuman skill the essential tragedy of that indecision of soul that we all have, to a greater or less degree, in ourselves. Romeo and Juliet will be immortal because they are great actors in a drama that is always playing in our own hearts. If we ourselves did not hesitate, did not love, we should not care for Hamlet or for Juliet. The author sees, in himself and in those around him, certain impulses and feelings, braveries and doubts, and the best that he can do is to endow his characters with these. He does so. He takes the daring of one, the simplicity of another, the affectation of a third, combines them, calls the result a man, puts it in a certain situation, and bids it speak and act. His success in literature depends upon two things—the poignancy of his situations and the psychological accuracy of his guesses at his character's speech and action. In this fashion, we may be absolutely confident, Homer drew Thersites and Hardy drew Tess. There is no other way.

If the author goes further, takes one of his acquaintances as a whole, or, worse still, takes as a whole the worst side of one of his acquaintances, and presents it without any disguise, he does, no doubt, an ungentlemanly thing. Dickens was ungentlemanly when he caricatured Leigh Hunt in Harold Skimpole. Of course, this statement does not apply to the honest attempt to reproduce figures of past history, such as Thackeray makes in Esmond or Churchill in Richard Carvel. Fidelity to personality is in such a case one of the demands we make upon the author. But to pillory a living man, to set him up, recognizable, before the public gaze, is ungentlemanly.

Unfortunately, authors will continue to do it. For it is, in the first place, easy. Each of us knows many a person with latent, or even obvious, possibilities of drama in the relation of his character to actual events. The temptation to reproduce him, character, events and all, is often strong. And, in the second place, speaking only from the point of view of art, of craftsmanship, it seems to me entirely permissible. There is no reason why such a figure as, for instance, that of Cecil Rhodes should not, if adequately presented in fiction, be of permanent and surpassing interest. That it offers grave difficulties Mr. Morley Roberts showed by his bad failure in The Colossus; and any model which offers grave difficulties tickles the ambition of the artist. Again, the trend of the world's thought to-day seems businesswards. Therefore it is inevitable that the type of great business man will be given a place in fiction, as the type of great captain has been in the past. Harold Frederic tried his hand in The Market-Place; Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne tried his in Thompson's Progress. Both of those gentlemen endeavored to create a type — not a character who was unique, but one who was the essence, the exponent, of a class. Had they chosen rather to draw some individual man they might have succeeded just as well, and against their craftsmanship we should have had not a word to say; but of their ethics and their courtesy we might have had our own opinions.

— James Weber Linn.

FRIEND PAUL — A man with the qualities of the original boy — wholesome and impulsive.

¶ When some of us, who now are gray, were young folks, a new story-teller began to talk in the world, and the facts which he told us were more strange and incredible than the fables of Scheherezade or Grimm. When he was a boy of sixteen, his father, a French planter in Louisiana, sent him as supercargo on one of his ships, which was to bring back skins and ivory from the African coast. Some of the vessels that sailed in their company carried on a blacker trade. Under their battened hatches went on mysteries of torture and murder which the boy soon understood. He loathed the business. His hands and soul were clean of it, be sure of that.

He always had a curious liking and fellowship for the negro, the red man — for all wild races. The woods called to him — the mysterious unknown secret quarters of the earth. He plunged into them with a boyish delight and utter ignorance of technical Anthropology.

In the old maps of Africa of that day you will find a vast tract of blank yellow filling the whole centre, and marked Unexplored Region. Into this Mystery went Paul du Chaillu with his beads and his gun, a chubby, cheerful boy with a friendly hand outstretched to every savage. It is a short story. He crossed unhurt from sea to sea, leaving wondering black friends behind him. He discovered the tribes of pygmies and the gorilla. Coming back to civilization he told his strange story. We all read it as a fairy tale; Royal Geographical Societies brutally rejected it as a lie.

Years afterward, when the truth of his story was proved, they recanted, but they never did him justice.

That was a half a century ago, but in all of that time Friend Paul, as those who knew him loved to call him, remained the same clean-minded, affectionate, eager boy, always finding depths of goodness or power in his friends which nobody else suspected.

Now and then, in every generation and country, there starts up a man with the qualities of the original Boy. He thrusts custom and precedent aside. He gets to the heart of things. His tears are wet, his laugh rings true and hearty. He stirs up wholesome longings and ambitions in every man and woman whom he meets. The dullest, most perfunctory slave of fashion grows human with him. When he laughs you laugh; when he is in trouble there is an angry ache at your heart that will not down. He may be learned in books and gray with experience, but at heart he is forever the boy who trusts and is trusted by all who are of his kind in the earth.

Why is it that the world invariably loves this kind of man but does not take him seriously?

He does not, it is true, accept its rules nor its scale of values. He does not care to make money; he never has asked whether he has a right to join the Sons of the Revolution or whether his wife is in the exclusive set in the town or not.

But his work has sometimes been of the highest. Walter Scott was of this class of men, and Clay, and Robert Emmet, and Francis of Assisi, and the Apostle John. The supercilious world accepts the work but regards the impulsive worker with a pity almost contemptuous.

The cat, we remember, said to the ugly duck, "Can you purr like me?" And the hen asked, "Can you lay eggs like me?"

"No? Then," they cried, "of what earthly use are you in the world!"

The Correspondence College

By George Herbert Fisher

"POVERTY," significantly remarks Ouida, "is a kind of blindness. We can only grope through life when we are poor, hitting and maiming ourselves against every angle." The blindness of poverty is due to its ignorance of ways and means that, were it educated, it might utilize. A system, such as that of the correspondence schools, that enables the poor and those in moderate circumstances to secure efficiency through knowledge, is a step in the onward progress of civilization.

The need of technical training for the workers is as old as the New World. "We are at Pains to make boys Scholars, but not Men," said William Penn, two centuries ago; "to talk rather than to know. We press their Memory too soon, and puzzle, strain and load them with Words and Rules; to know Gramar and Rhetorick, and a strange tongue or two, that it is ten to one will never be useful to them; Leaving their natural Genius to Mechanical and Physical, or Natural Knowledge uncultured and neglected. Many Gardiners and Husbandmen are yet Ignorant of the Reason of their Calling; as most Artificers are of the Reason of their own Rules that govern their excellent Workmanship." It was not for over two hundred years after this was written that facilities were provided to fill the want indicated by William Penn.

Some of Those Who Benefit

A contracting carpenter told me recently that he had just had two opportunities that he would like to have seized, but could not: to draw the plans for one house and to make up the specifications for another.

"I had to lose both jobs," said he, "because I could not draw a plan to scale and hadn't learned to make out masonry specifications."

"I am going to take a correspondence course in architecture," he continued; adding regretfully, "but the fees on those two jobs alone would nearly have paid for the course."

This indicates the classes whom William Penn wished to better and whom the correspondence courses benefit in greatest numbers—men who are at a point in their work where further advancement is blocked by lack of education. Those for whom the correspondence schools were specifically designed are included in three great classes: first, mechanics whom the advancing requirements of the trades have overtaken and who need instruction therein, to keep from falling into the widening ranks of common labor; second, people whom circumstances, or poor judgment, have placed in occupations where they cannot possibly succeed and who need to change to work suited to their abilities; and, lastly, boys and girls who desire to enter occupations, preparation for which is ordinarily made in technical or professional schools, but who cannot afford to lose the time or spend the money requisite for residence courses of study.

To educate these classes in the theory of the trades and professions the correspondence schools sprang into being in the early nineties, and have grown with a vigor reminding one of Jack and the Bean Stalk. In 1891, when the first courses by mail were offered, adapted to the requirements of miners and mechanical workers, the hitherto potential demand of the people for opportunity to secure technical education became an active one, and from one solitary student by mail the number has risen to half a million; and the correspondence system of education has accomplished and is doing a work in the educational scheme of the country as needful in its sphere as that of the public schools, colleges and technical schools is in theirs.

The number of institutions and individuals offering correspondence courses of study is two hundred or more. They range all the way from irresponsible and ignorant "mail-order men" and frauds designed to impose on credulous believers in one or another phase of the "magic power of mind over mind," up to some of the best-known colleges and universities and to one great institution, of vast financial strength, devoted solely to correspondence instruction, and employing hundreds of specialists and experts.

An excellent plan for the intending student by mail to follow is to write to students of the institutions about whose courses he is inquiring, and to decide upon their reliability by what the students report, giving due consideration to the intelligence and position of the latter, as well as to what friends say who are engaged in the line of work in which the intended course is given.

There are two principal methods of instruction employed by the leading correspondence institutions. The colleges and universities giving such courses require their correspondence students to study from the regular college textbooks. Professors or tutors direct the students by means of a syllabus and by lectures upon the books, and secure thoroughness through an occasional "quiz," or examination. The faculty of the University of Chicago are particularly enthusiastic over the results attained there by the correspondence method. Dr. C. A. McMurray, Professor of Pedagogy, says: "Those who took my course by correspondence did three times as effective work and gained three times as much satisfaction for themselves as those who took it in the classroom." And President Harper and others of the University faculty are equally enthusiastic over correspondence instruction as carried on at their institution. This method of instruction appeals to those classes who already possess considerable education, such as clergymen and teachers, but who desire to keep abreast of current progress or to work for advanced degrees. It is not, however, adapted to the needs of the comparatively uneducated, because the average textbook necessarily presupposes an amount of education not possessed by any large proportion of the people.

How the Courses are Laid Out

The other method, employed by the typical great correspondence schools, is to employ experts in the lines in which courses are to be given, who prepare complete courses of study, from arithmetic up to the most advanced subjects. Only such classes of mathematics are embodied as are needed to utilize effectively the formulas and processes employed in actual work, for it is necessary to abridge the courses in this respect in order to meet the requirements of men who have only an hour or two a day for study. The courses of study are divided into relatively short lessons, accompanied by sets of test questions which the student answers and mails to the school, proceeding with the next lesson while his answers are being corrected at the school. The corrected answers are returned to the student with personal suggestions as to how to strengthen himself on weak points. A high standard of thoroughness is maintained, ninety per cent. being the minimum passing mark. The courses of study are models of conciseness and completeness, and it is to their excellence that the great success of the correspondence system of instruction is to be attributed.

Judged by results there is not so much difference between an education obtained by this method and that gained in a technical residence course. Some of the most important positions, for example, in the development of the great trolley systems throughout the country, requiring the services of employees capable of filling the positions of mechanical and electrical engineers, are filled by men who have not the dignity of a college diploma, and filled most creditably, too. The retiring president of the national association of the officials of electric-light companies states that the man in whose judgment in mechanical matters he puts most reliance, in matters of greatest importance, got his entire education in the practical work of the shop with a correspondence course in electrical engineering to complete it. On every hand are to be found men in the important positions of mechanical, electrical, civil and mining engineers, doing effective work, whose technical education was obtained in correspondence courses in engineering.

Drafting occupies a large place in the list of occupations entered by the correspondence method, and the army of invasion trained in the new system of education is pressing into other vocations, such as chemistry, architecture, designing, telegraphy and telephony, entrance into which always, hitherto, presupposed training at a residence school. In the future it is to be expected that, in a larger measure than before, men from the shop and the field will be found occupying the higher positions in engineering, because the correspondence system has placed them at a less disadvantage with their brothers from the engineering schools than in the past, a fact that the people who cannot go to college have not been slow to recognize.

Captains of industry have taken very kindly to the correspondence system of instruction in engineering and the trades. It gives them an unprecedented opportunity to increase the effectiveness of their expenditure for labor. The lack of efficiency has been felt more than is generally known. One large concern that accepted a heavy job of a kind a little out of the common, some time ago, was able to put but two men on it; the superintendent and a foreman were the only ones out of several hundred who had enough technical and practical training to do the work required. A railroad master mechanic remarked recently that, if he could do it, he would have every man in his employ take a correspondence course along the lines of his work. The vice-president of a railroad bought ten courses for subordinates in the civil engineering division of his railroad.

Not all employers furnish courses for their employees, but a great many advise their men to take them. Many concerns furnish study-rooms or drafting-rooms better equipped than many regular drafting offices. A leading manufacturing company at Dayton, Ohio, is one among many that encourages clubs of students, and it equips a clubroom for their use. In cities where there are many correspondence students, the students have organized clubs of their own for mutual improvement. Clubrooms are rented and furnished with blackboards and study-tables, where the members can meet, discuss their studies, and help one another to the successful completion of their courses.

Of Interest to Employers

In the railroad business the results of correspondence instruction are apparent, and especially so to those on "the inside." It always seemed to be difficult for engineers and firemen to master the mysteries of combustion, the action of steam, and the adjustment of the steam mechanism and appliances; the little points were missed that go for the greatest economy of operation. The companies, therefore, welcomed the opportunity of securing savings that would help out the dividend sheet, and it was not long after the preparation of courses for railroad men that the advantage of employing correspondence graduates was manifest. Within a year after one of the well-known railroads had its engineers and firemen take courses, the general manager said: "We are using twenty per cent. less coal and fifty per cent. less oil than before our engineers and firemen took these courses." The courses are a good thing, also, for the men in their struggle for advancement. At one general examination for promotion on the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad a large percentage of the firemen coming before the board of examiners were correspondence students, and every one of those who had made good records in their courses of study passed successfully, with a high mark.

Among the functions of the ordinary college or technical school is that of an employment bureau. The best students are recommended for positions. One of the technical schools this year secured situations for its entire graduating class. The correspondence school acts in the same capacity for its best students, securing, yearly, better positions for thousands of students. The presentation of a diploma in a course by mail is the "open sesame" to many drafting-rooms and mechanical or electrical shops. The thorough student, by whatever system taught, makes the most desirable employee.

It is impossible for any one to gain an idea of the work done by a great correspondence school, or the spirit in which it is carried on, until he visits the institution, or, at least, comes into touch with those helped by it. The working classes are thoroughly familiar with this class of schools and justly consider them the greatest boon ever offered. The correspondence school made its advent just in the nick of time, when advances in industrial methods were so rapid and changes so complete that, even for mechanics, success was impossible without a certain degree of knowledge, and when it had become "Educate or perish." Happily, American genius promptly supplied the deficiency.

UNTIE the KNOT with SYSTEM

System in business is protection from snarls—protection from knotty, vexatious complications—protection from the little nuisances that waste time and money. The trivial troubles are the ones that keep you from getting things done. True system is automatic insurance against them. This page describes some of the appliances which smooth the way to a well-systematized business. These appliances save watching—save worrying. Read this page carefully. A convenient coupon in the lower right-hand corner will bring more detailed information without cost.

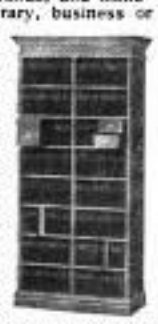
An ERICSSON INTERIOR TELEPHONE SYSTEM shortens office work, saves actual time, saves confusion. To some men such a system seems a luxury. All who have installed the system know it is an economy. Cheap interior 'phones soon get out of order. That's worse than no system at all. But the Ericsson is built to last—the same quality and style used on long distance lines. No other concern anywhere has studied the telephone system so thoroughly, or devised so many special instruments and attachments to save time and bother in office communication. The Ericsson system contains all the best features of other 'phones and some features found in no other 'phones. Ask now for Catalog 4.

There was a time when any old chair would do for the office. Business and comfort were not partners. But times have changed and ideas of business comfort have changed with them. McCLOUD'S NEW TWENTIETH CENTURY ADJUSTABLE SPRING BACK CHAIRS have been important factors in the improvement. "Back Rosiers" they call them—because they give complete back rest while at work, thereby enabling the man at the desk or woman at the typewriter to accomplish more work with greater comfort. Catalog 14 describes the McCloud Chairs and shows the adjustment which fits the back.

A postal scale is not a luxury—it is a necessity. The greater the amount of mail, the more actual necessity it becomes. The owner of a PELOUZE "MAIL & EXPRESS" SCALE will save its cost in a short time, and the heavier and larger his mail is the shorter the time will be. It tells the exact cost of postage on all mail matter. It weighs express packages up to 16 lbs.—every scale is warranted. Whether your mail list is large or small, it will help you to cut down your stamp bill, as well as facilitate the handling of mail. Catalog 10 will give you useful information about Reliable Postal Scales. Ask for it on the coupon.

No matter what you want to file—information, papers, samples, documents—there is a Shaw-Walker way to do it. And that way is the best way because it is the most simple. Shaw-Walker card systems are better than books—Shaw-Walker vertical letter files better than flat sheet cabinets—Shaw-Walker sectional bookcases better than solid ones. All are built in sections so they will grow as your business grows. Send to-day for Catalog 19. It tells all about SHAW-WALKER SYSTEMS. The book is concise, terse, yet complete. Costs the Shaw-Walker Company 3c. to send it, but they will do so gladly if you simply sign the coupon on the corner of this advertisement.

Time is money. This is particularly true in the commercial world. BAIRD'S No. 12 TIME STAMP makes an absolutely accurate record for every purpose where time counts. The receipt of correspondence, job time, the arrival and departure of employees and in countless other cases time is measured to the minute by this—the only durable time stamp. It is made of the finest materials, with finely polished steel bearings. The clock movement, being in an entirely separate compartment from the stamping mechanism, is unaffected by the hammer action. The price is remarkably low. Catalog 3 describes and illustrates the Baird Time Stamp.



For many years methods of accounting did not change materially, but when the BURROUGHS ADDING MACHINE was placed on the market this branch of office work was revolutionized. To-day there are 14,000 of these great time savers in banks, mercantile houses, factories, wholesale and retail stores, etc. Wherever this machine is not part of an office equipment it is because its merits are not understood. It bears the same relation to figures that the typewriter does to correspondence. It adds figures with ten times the speed of the quickest clerk and it is mechanically impossible for it to make a mistake. Described in Catalog 13

File your clippings, memoranda, and manuscript. Every busy man—literary, business or professional—realizes the great necessity of properly filing and classifying memoranda, clippings, data, etc.

Any one who has spent time searching through a mass of papers for a paragraph once marked, a misplaced clipping or memorandum, will appreciate the tremendous advantage of having such data arranged in order and at his fingers' ends.

The LIBRARY FILING CABINET is the solution of the problem of classification. It is the acme of simplicity and ready reference. Send for Catalog 8. It gives valuable information that cannot be acquired from any other source.

The little things in an office sometimes save the most time, labor and money. RUBBER STAMPS, NUMBERING MACHINES, ETC., suited to your business, will aid you in a countless number of ways, and at little cost considering the valuable service they can render. There is system in using stamps, too, that you ought to know about. An ingenious little holder called "Rex" keeps them in order, clean and handy. The best ideas on Rubber Stamps and kindred articles are described in Catalog 12. New ideas for Rubber Stamps are being discovered almost daily. If you send for this catalog you will receive not only the latest and most practical ideas discovered up to date, but will be kept informed of new schemes that are being constantly originated in the leading mercantile houses.

Old fashioned bound books for accounts are impractical and expensive. Loose leaf books allow of arrangement, rearrangement and expansion. They save time, for the yearly or semi-yearly opening of new books is done away with. They are self indexing. No outside index is required. The JONES PERPETUAL LEDGER COMPANY'S LOOSE LEAF BOOKS have every advantage of any loose leaf book and more—absolute alignment of the leaves—a strong binder in which the leaves cannot move a hair's breadth. Every progressive business man should read Catalog 1. It explains JONES PERPETUAL LEDGER COMPANY'S LOOSE LEAF BOOKS and how you can use them in your business.

SOME business men are prejudiced against fountain pens. And that same prejudice has kept them from knowing how great a saving WATERMAN'S IDEAL FOUNTAIN PENS would make in their office work. Continuous writing without dipping and blotting saves so much of a man's own time—and the time of his stenographers and clerks—that a pen pays for itself in a short time. But the fountain pen must be a "Waterman," else the bother and leaks and breaks might offset the saving. Catalog 5 tells all about Waterman's Ideal Fountain Pens, and of special pens made for modern office work. If you are interested in manifold work, tell us.

The PROTECTOGRAPH absolutely secures the integrity of checks. It impresses a line like this: NOT OVER FIVE DOLLARS 5 in strictly indelible ink upon any preferred part of the check so deeply as to make the line a part of the document itself and absolutely unalterable and ineffaceable. It is used by the U. S. Treasury and more than 10,000 financial and industrial institutions. The machine is a model of mechanical beauty, simplicity and efficiency. Write for Catalog 15, which tells some things about check raising and check protection that you may not know. A postal card will bring it.

No office is considered complete without an EDISON MIMEOGRAPH. In these days of commercial competition there is no surer, quicker or cheaper way of quickening business than by employing the many means offered by this valuable machine. There is a place in almost any business where an Edison Mimeograph will save time and money. Perhaps you see no use for it in your office. You probably will after you read Catalog 6 and understand what a Mimeograph will do. It will pay you well to read it. Cut out and sign the coupon on the corner of this advertisement, or better still write us a letter stating your business.

Every man who conducts correspondence is interested in the question "Which is the best typewriter?" There are twenty-five substantial reasons why the OLIVER TYPEWRITER is the best machine the world has produced. So phenomenally successful has this machine become that it has proven its unqualified right to the title, "The Standard Visible Writer," and the business world has decided that its adoption increases quantity, improves quality and reduces expense. Strong claims—but easily proven. The wide range of the Oliver Typewriter's usefulness makes it easy to adopt systems heretofore impracticable except with the pen. Catalog 2 explains in detail.

The ADDRESSOGRAPH is as necessary to a modern office as steam is to an engine. With it an office boy can do in one hour what it formerly took ten clerks two hours to do. It not only addresses envelopes in exact imitation of typewriting, but also fills in names on duplicate letters, prints names and addresses on shipping tags, pay envelopes, time tickets, monthly statements and loose leaf systems. Thousands of business houses now have their lists of names arranged for the Addressograph and kept by States or Territories so that printed matter can be speedily sent to any special list. There is at least one place in your business for the Addressograph. Learn now what it will do. Catalog 7 describes it, and illustrates its many uses. Write for it to-day.

Modern business methods presuppose a convenient and orderly arrangement of papers. By the most approved system all orders, forms and records are spread on punched loose sheets, which are filed and classified according to the varying needs of each business. While in active use these loose sheets are kept in Holders if there be few, and in Binders if there be many; and when old the sheets are consecutively filed away in Transfer Binders as permanent records. The TATUM HOLDERS and BINDERS comprise 3 styles and 78 stock sizes. With them any one can easily start and maintain a loose-sheet system. These and other office devices are described in Catalog No. 16.

The Reading Table

A Democratic Monarch

THE Duke of Bavaria is a zither player of uncommon ability and often wanders out into the woods where he can enjoy undisturbed the charm of music.

One day, when he had found a secluded nook and was absorbed in his favorite pastime, some passing peasants, attracted by the music, made their way to him.

"You play well," said the leader as the Duke, becoming aware of the presence of intruders, laid down his instrument; "if you will follow us to the inn yonder and give us a few tunes we will see that you do not want for food and drink."

"At your service," said the amused monarch, rising and joining the rustic crowd.

Once at the inn he was made to play every song he knew while the peasants applauded loudly and insisted on his drinking bumper after bumper of the rich, foaming beer.

It was nearing sundown when the Duke rose to leave.

"I must go now," he said. "I am expected in Munich before night."

"Just one more tune," shouted the crowd, "the Duke's Waltz, and we let you go."

He hesitated.

"Twenty sous for the waltz," continued the speaker, laying down a coin on the table.

The Duke smiled and played the waltz; then he pocketed the money and, with a farewell to the merry party, he left.

No sooner was he outside than the innkeeper, who had recognized the monarch and had only kept his peace because warned to by a sign, hastened to the peasants.

"Have you fools any idea of who the person was that you treated like a common street fiddler?"

"Not the slightest," answered one; "but he is certainly a great musician. Do you know him?"

"Know him? Why, it is the Duke, in person."

With a bound every man was on his feet and rushed after his sovereign begging his forgiveness.

"No apologies," said the Duke merrily. "You gave me more pleasure with your sincere appreciation than I have ever had before, and the money is the first I have ever earned. Go back without fear; and to prove I am not angry I will come again and play for you and we will again drink together."

When the President Tramps

RESIDENTS of Washington who take their outings in carriages and auto-vehicles wonder why in all their trips, particularly along the suburban roads of the Capital, they have never encountered President Roosevelt. They have seen him frequently on his favorite mounts, but never afoot.

That the Chief Magistrate goes out walking every available opportunity when he is in Washington is known. And stories are told of how he returns, his shoes and clothing giving unmistakable evidence of a long and vigorous tramp.

The President seldom, if ever, starts out afoot from the White House. When determined on a long walk he is driven to some point in the wooded environs of the city, where, after dismissing the driver, he disappears, returning many hours later, sometimes with dust, cobwebs, grass stains and forest mould from head to foot.

Dr. Gifford Pinchot and other scientists who sometimes accompany the President can readily explain why eager carriage riders never enjoy meeting him. It is simply because he strikes right out through the woods and across fields, turning aside from every beaten path. There is scarcely any part of the beautiful woodlands within a day's tramp from the White House with which the President has not already become familiar. With special particularity he has located many fine springs. These halting-places for refreshing drinks have proved the salvation of several statesmen who in rash moments have put themselves in the way to be invited to share a walking trip with the President. To bolt straight up a hill thick with laurel and hazel underbrush and tangled with wild blackberry vines is a trying ordeal, particularly for men unaccustomed to exercise.

What Education Means

IN THIS work-a-day world an education does not mean a Latin parchment from some college, or a few learned phrases stored up in one's head. It means, instead, a fund of useful facts that may be used in one's business. It means the practical mastery of one's trade or profession. It means a general alertness about what has happened and what is happening in the world's affairs.

That is why the ENCYCLOPAEDIA BRITANNICA is of the highest value to the busy man and to the ambitious youth. It gives just the sort of information they really need, and it gives it at once. All its articles are authoritative—written by the world's most eminent specialists. A dip in its pages for only a few moments each day will soon round out a liberal education.

Britannica is Interesting

Some people have the idea that all encyclopedias are dull reading. To such people we say: "Try the BRITANNICA!"

Are you interested in that strange land of China? Britannica contains one of the best and most readable histories of China ever written.

Do you want to know something about eclipses of the sun, or other wonderful facts about astronomy? Richard A. Proctor, the world's greatest astronomer, wrote an article of 80 pages, finely illustrated, for BRITANNICA. This article has since been made a school text-book.

Do you want to know something about Aristotle and the Greek philosophers? Consult BRITANNICA.

Or perhaps you wish to study electricity. See what BRITANNICA says on this great topic.

You will find ANY SUBJECT YOU WANT in these 25,000 large pages. More than three millions of dollars were spent to prepare this greatest of universities, which is now within your reach, IF YOU ACT PROMPTLY, for TEN CENTS A DAY.

The Morley Ear-Drum

is the most recent and most effective invisible device for the relief of deafness. It is easily adjusted, comfortable and safe. Send for descriptive booklet.

The Morley Company, Dept. T
19 South 10th Street, Philadelphia

Sometimes the President has his carriage meet him at the end of his outing, but usually the itinerary is too uncertain for that, and those who watch the White House grounds narrowly have the pleasure toward nightfall of seeing the strenuous Chief Magistrate return. He still at such time has his vigorous step, but frequently his comrades limp or betray other symptoms of fatigue.

Potato Precedence

DOWN in Cochran, Georgia, the affairs of civil justice are administered by Judge Edwards, who is also a capable and enthusiastic farmer.

One cloudy spring afternoon court was convened to try a peculiarly tortuous and perplexing case. Judge Edwards listened uneasily for a time, with growing unrest, every now and then casting a quick glance through the nearest window. He was observed at last to seize a slip of paper, scribble a few words, place the document beneath a heavy paper-weight, and reach for his hat.

"Captain," he called cheerily, "excuse me fur interruptin' you, suh; you go right on with your argument, which is a darned good one. It's suah goin' to rain this evenin', gentlemen, an' I got to set out my potatoes right away. But you go right on, Captain! When you an' the Major get through you-all 'll find my decision under this heah paper-weight."

And the door closed upon an astonished orator.

Fame and Fate

By Edmund Vance Cooke

"WORK for the world, but art for me!
I shall win my way with the brush," said she.
She studied art; she studied it hard;
She painted canvases, yard on yard
(For "Art is long," as I'm sure you've heard),
Two strokes, or three
For a blasted tree
And a wiggle or two for a flying bird.
But "art" is sometimes purest gold,
And sometimes merest gilding—
So she "wins her way with the brush," I'm told,
By scrubbing a New York building.

"The world may dig in the dark," said he,
"But the beam of the footlights beckons me."
So he cried in grief and he cried in joy,
He screamed the scream
Of Aram's Dream,
And he groaned the groan of The Polish Boy.
He likewise remarked, "On the murderer's hands
Is the blood of his victim! there he stands!"
And, "Listen, proud maid! You shall be my wife
Even though it shall cost your husband's life."
But "Art is long"—very long—so, too,
Are the miles of ties on the C. B. Q.
So he's "on the stage"—in Idaho
From Seven Devils to Silver Bow.

"Love for the common, but mine is fame!"
She cried, "and the world shall know my name."
Corrupting English, she called it "verse,"
While "poetry" graded somewhat worse.
"Now flees my love
As doth the dove
Which moults to feathery clouds above.
Its cryptic cry apace doth haste
And wounds the wind which sweeps the waste."
Ah, "Art is long" (in sad endurance)
And Fame coquettes with bald Assurance.
And now, wherever the English tongue
Is put into print her praise is sung,
For she was cured of manifold ills
By Buncombe Bitters and Pigweed Pills.

"Gold cozens the soul of men, but mine,"
He said, "is filled with the art divine.
Music may lead me whither she may;
I toil at the ivories day by day
Till the world shall gather when I shall play."
He practiced in every conceivable key—
Rumpety, tumpety, tunk tank, tee;
Ripplety, skipplety, lol-la-lee!
Till his brow with an honest dew was wet
And neighboring flats were marked "To Let."
Yes, "Art is long," but the wise retort
That the artist himself is sometimes short.
So the world does gather to watch him play
As he fingers the ivories day by day
In a billiard hall in Santa Fe.

Early in life and early in the day is the best time to commence the use of the delicious dentifrice.

Oddities & Novelties of Every-Day Science

A NEW FUTURE FOR THE POTATO — It finds its way to the table in a thousand and one unrecognized forms.

GLUCOSE is one of the many things that owe their existence to the reign of Napoleon Bonaparte. His continental blockade created a demand for a product that could be used as a substitute for sugar. Starch subjected to the action of sulphuric acid yielded the desired commodity. The dextrose, of which glucose chiefly consists, was first made from grapes. In 1819 Beaconnot obtained it from vegetable fibre, or cellulose, such as linen rags and sawdust, by the action of sulphuric acid. Sulphuric acid is still used in the process, but linen rags and sawdust have given way to potatoes and corn.

Scientists are devoting much attention to the manufacture of glucose in the United States, where it has become a very extensive industry. Millions of people in America consume glucose, most of them without knowing it. It is used as a substitute for barley-malt in the brewing of certain brands of beer. It is employed as coloring matter for liquors. Some kinds of wine are made from it. It is the basis of some brands of vinegar. Bakers use it in certain varieties of cakes. In the preparation of sauces it is widely used. It imparts flavor to canned meats. It is used in the preparation of chewing tobacco. Jellies and jams abound with it. Artificial honey its made of glucose. It is valuable in the manufacture of ink. Stranger still, it is employed in the manufacture of printers' rollers.

Nor does that list cover the range of its utility. As a food product it is not deleterious when properly extracted. The one criticism made by Government inspectors is that glucose in many instances is substituted for more expensive sugar, which is regarded as a fraud, unless its presence is in some way indicated to the purchaser.

In Germany and France glucose is made from potatoes; in America from Indian corn. It is the opinion of the Department of Agriculture that in the near future the glucose industry in the United States will pass from the Indian-corn belt to the potato and cassava belt, and that this move will cause great wealth to flow into Florida and other Southern States. The cassava (Manihot aipi) is the tubercle from which tapioca is made.

If care is taken in the somewhat complicated processes by which the glucose of commerce is extracted it is not injurious. The deaths in England of many people who had drunk ale made of beer brewed with glucose were due to the faulty and careless methods of manufacture. That a well-regulated manufacture of glucose is destined to become one of the most important industries in the United States is recognized as an assured fact, and the prediction of Government scientists that the potato and the cassava will supplant Indian corn as the raw product is a matter of vital concern to agriculturists.

THE MUSICIAN'S AMANUENSIS — A mechanical contrivance that will take down the composer's improvisations.

THERE died recently in the Orient an American Consul who was the composer of a number of highly successful ballads. He did not, himself, write the scores. The melodies came to him naturally, but for the technical skill in harmonizing them he called upon professional musicians.

Despite the success of his published songs it was conceded that something of their witchery was lost in transcription. It is the confession likewise of composers who write their own creations that frequently the strains they improvise are inadequately caught in the mechanical labor of writing down the notes.

In perfecting a new apparatus for recording music the inventor is confident that an innovation is at hand in the art of musical composition. With this new system the composer may improvise on the piano and at the end possess a faithful score of his creation. Not a note is lost and the important element of time is recorded with utmost precision.

In principle the recording apparatus employs some of the essentials of typewriting. Rods actuated by springs are combined with the keys of a piano. Connected with the rods are pivotal levers whose points are made to strike against an ink-ribbon and leave the note record on ruled impression slips. The length of the mark printed depends upon the length of time the operator holds the piano key depressed. At the left of the strip of paper, which is carried on reels, cross lines divide the music into bars of four-four time, and to the right of the centre into bars of three-four time, and to the extreme right, still narrower measures of two-four time, these measure lines being printed by the tilting of a bar in the operations of the device.

In guiding this printing bar a series of lugs and disks are engaged. A spring-motor drives the strip of paper and the ink-ribbon. The whole device with its gear-wheels, levers, etc., is attached to the under part of the frame of a piano. Paper specially prepared with longitudinal lines is used, the treble and bass clef being distinguished each by combinations of double lines. Continuous single lines correspond to the white keys, and dotted lines to the black keys.

FOR BOILERS WITH HOT LIVERS — A new specific which repairs the effects of bad boiler drink.

FROM leguminous plants a chemist has produced a compound which promises its discoverer a fortune and is likely to be of great value to the owner and operator of every steam engine in the world. It is a solution which, under practical tests, has had unprecedented success, it is asserted, in removing the dangerous accumulation of scale, which, with bad water, forms in all steam generators.

Ever since steam power was discovered the problem of removing alkaline and saline deposits in boilers has taxed the ingenuity of chemists and engineers. To prevent dangerous accumulation of this incrustation requires scientific vigilance, for the accretions, if left undisturbed, would finally congest the boiler and bring about explosion.

A wide variety of solutions and substances is employed, including penetrating oils like kerosene and eucalyptus oil. On coastwise and Southern river steamers, engineers sometimes make ingenious use of sugar and potato parings in fighting boiler scale. A Chicago firm of chemists analyze water sent them from any locality and prepare a compound intended to make special chemical warfare on the sulphate, lime or other deposits found in boilers using that particular quality of water.

In spite of many years of effort the problem seems to be a constant one. In Peking the United States Government is constructing a Legation building, and one of the serious questions that confronts Mr. Sid H. Nealy, the architect sent out by the Treasury Department, is the prevention of deposits which the alkaline waters of that district will cause in the boilers and steam-heating appliances of the structure.

The discoverer of the new remedy says that in the case of a locomotive boiler that had become nearly unworkable, on account of the stubborn accumulation of scale, practically the whole of the deposit was removed from the tubes and other portions by adding about one pound, or half a kilogram, of his absorbent material to the feed-water of the boiler once every twenty-four hours for six days. He reports that at the end of that time the scale fell in a soft pulverulent precipitate to the bottom of the boiler, whence it was readily removed by blowing off.

"If that compound will clean an incrusted boiler out in less than a week, the inventor has a big fortune at hand," said a mechanical engineer in charge of one of the largest Government plants in Washington. "The very best solution we have ever had would not do the work in less than four months. What is claimed for this new process is really a scientific discovery of world-wide importance."

The new compound is extracted from leguminous plants, preferably from those of the sub-order papilionaceæ, which are readily obtained. Tares, vetches, lentils and peas are included in this family. Stalk, root, leaves, pod and seed are all used. Plants are gathered while full of sap. After the plants are dried and cut up the mass is subjected to calcium hydrate and sodium carbonate to remove the soluble matter. Various processes of concentration and filtration follow until a powerful vegetable casein is produced. For the trade it is concentrated to a strong solution and then mixed with dry moss or peat or other porous and easily powdered material. The extract is to be used in varying quantities to suit individual requirements. In a clean boiler a very small portion added once in every twenty-four hours to the feed-water tank will, it is claimed, effectually keep the inner surface free from scale.

It is expected that the Federal Government will give the compound a thorough trial.

A New Idea in Cloth Brushes

Most Cloth Brushes are made with flag ends of bristles, very soft and flimsy, which have to be trimmed off flat with a machine cutter.

The result is a smooth surface which slides over the material to be brushed without penetrating the fibres of the cloth.

Our brushes are made with penetrating knots of bristle, stiff enough to clean dirt and dust from the deepest pile fabric.

Try it and see how it takes hold.

Little Talks With Big Men

EVERY now and then, in the course of the cyclic changes in matters journalistic, the editor of one of the papers that set the fashion for the rest of the continent stumbles on what he believes to be a new idea. Straightway he proceeds to "hit up" that idea until it is hit so high it reaches an atmosphere too thin for life. Then it dies, usually unmourned. The meteoric career of most of the innovations in journalism may be described in this way: First a novelty that interests; then a tiresome thing that palls; finally a horror that is kicked out of the way to make room for its successor. Any old newspaper man could name these innovations consecutively, beginning with a period say ten years back. With only one, however, has this story to deal, namely, the "signed statement" craze.

The "signed statement" craze probably originated in the mind of some astute student of the opinions of newspaper readers, who saw that the public were beginning to take cum grano salis everything that appeared in the daily papers. A signature to the "story" or statement would naturally enforce respect for its truth. Hence the "signed statement" fad, which, once started, whirled its way into every newspaper office in the country. "Get a signed statement" was the editorial command to every scribe assigned to a "story," whether it concerned the opinion of a Cabinet Minister on an approaching crisis, or the testimony of a servant girl in a suit for back wages.

Then came an astonishing era in the lives of the nation's great men. They were harassed half to death for "signed statements." Some were easy victims, others succumbed unwillingly, a few demanded money and were, if their names stood sufficiently high in the community, paid at their own price. Of the first class was Senator Chauncey M. Depew. Former Secretary Hitchcock once said to me: "Depew gets more out of life than any man I know." This was in allusion to Mr. Depew's habit of never allowing anything to ruffle the placid serenity of his life. Certainly the newspaper men of the country should rise up and call the Senator blessed, for he has seldom been known to refuse a request for an interview. It was not long after Mr. Depew made his first speech in the Senate that I was sent to ask him for a "signed statement" on some topic or other.

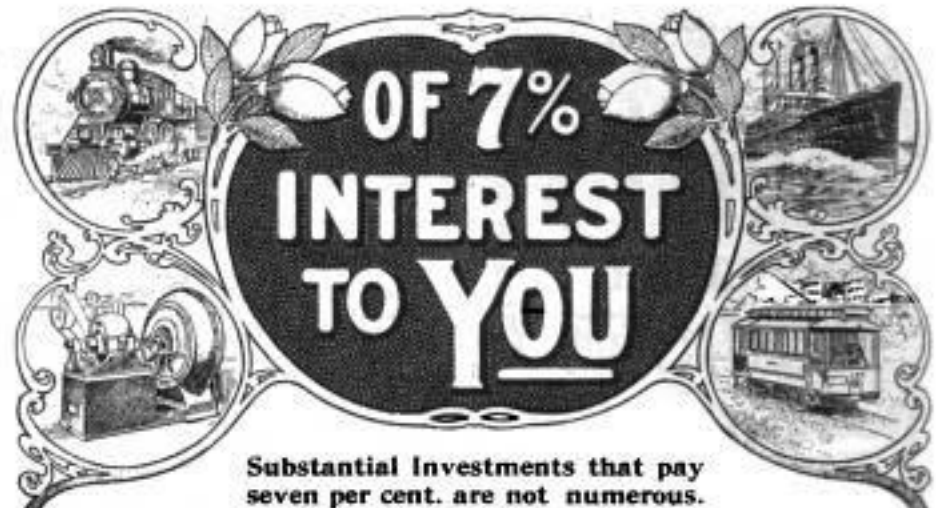
How Chauncey Depew Gives an Interview

The distinguished Senator, who was then at his handsome house in Washington, listened graciously to the request and queried:

"How much do you want?"

Who that has interviewed public men can wonder at the popularity of a Senator who responds to a request for a "signed statement" with, "How much do you want?"

Upon being informed that about two thousand would be the proper measurement, the Senator proceeded at once to deliver the goods verbally, while the science we owe to Pitman recorded his utterances for posterity. Every now and then the Senator would pause in his walk up and down the room and check his flight of oratory to ask:



"Is that two thousand words?"

When told no, he would cheerfully resume the walk and talk. When informed at last that the measure was full, the Senator cut off the oratorical current as suddenly as he turned it on. He appeared to take no further interest in the subject, and did not even request that the manuscript be forwarded to him for perusal before it appeared in print.

Senator Stewart's Impromptu Oration

One of the most curious experiences I had while trying to satisfy the editorial craving for "signed statements" was with Senator Stewart, of Nevada. I found him at the Waldorf-Astoria, and he led the way into, of all places, the dining-room of the hotel. The room was crowded with well-dressed people, all talking in the low tones of polite conversation. Marching up to one of the vacant tables, the Senator, a magnificent figure, with his flowing gray beard, stalwart frame and noble head, waved aside the waiters, sat down and began to dictate an interview in a voice that could be heard half across Fifth Avenue.

It was a warm day and the windows were raised. Through these open windows and above the hum of the assembled guests floated the sound of a mighty voice. Pedestrians on Fifth Avenue halted in wonderment and stood spellbound at the open window. Amazed guests at adjoining tables ceased their conversation and stared at the Senator. Waiters hovered in the offing, puzzled to know whether this was a case for the police or to be discreetly ignored.

Through it all, the owner of the voice continued his oration, utterly oblivious of his surroundings. Just then Senator Stewart had conceived an intense dislike for William Jennings Bryan, and most of the "signed statement" was devoted to an attack on the apostle of free silver. It was a most unhappy half-hour for the writer. Stewart held a red bandanna handkerchief in one large hand and with the other he emphasized every well-rounded sentence by bringing his fist down on the arm, the writing arm, of the seeker for "signed statements."

With the red bandanna waving in the air, the Senator uppercut Bryan with forensic fury, buffeted him in thunderous tones, challenged him in accents of deep disdain to disprove any assertion made in the interview, and with a final burst of eloquence threw him heavily to earth and left him to his fate.

Then Stewart wiped his forehead on the red bandanna and blandly smiled around at Society. And Society, by that time having grasped the situation, smiled back at the Senator. The "signed statement" was never printed, it may be of interest to know.

When former Governor Stone, of Missouri, was assisting in the Democratic campaign in New York he was sought for a "signed statement." He was considered an oracle on the subject of labor troubles, having once assisted in settling a strike, and his views, over his signature, were wanted on the ever-present labor problem. I found it was necessary to separate Mr. Stone from the Democratic Headquarters before he could be induced to contribute to current literature on the subject of strikes; and so, when the Governor flitted to Manhattan Beach for a short respite from campaign troubles, I was at his heels. I have seldom seen a man more dismayed than was Mr. Stone when he learned that he was expected to sign his name to the interview. Strange to say, it did not seem to suggest itself to him that he might tell the interviewer to go about his business.

"What!" said Mr. Stone. "Do you mean that the article is to be printed as my own?"

He seemed to be thunderstruck at the suggestion. But when convinced that there was no way out of it, Mr. Stone lit a big black cigar, and with the air of a man resigned to the inevitable dictated a labor article that was printed later in many of the leading papers of the country, and was without doubt one of the most able essays on the labor question ever written at such short notice.

What Tom Reed was Paid

There was a time when Tom Reed would allow his name to be used with articles that were not originally written for that purpose. In his Congressional days he thought more lightly of literary productions than when he became a lawyer in private practice. I had had some experience with Mr. Reed in Washington, when he would good-naturedly hand out something intended for a speech, but for some reason not used, and allow it to be printed with his name attached. With this knowledge of Tom Reed I thought, when sent by a Philadelphia newspaper to New York with an offer of three hundred dollars for a short article, that the ex-Speaker would gladly respond. To my surprise, however, I found that Tom Reed's opinion of the value of his literary productions had greatly changed since the Washington days.

"That sum doesn't interest me at all," said Mr. Reed in his slow, emphatic way. "I am paid a thousand dollars for every article I write. Why any one should consider my writings worth so much I am constantly at a loss to know. But it is not my business to inquire too closely into that. I only know that I have a standing offer of one thousand dollars for every article I like to write, so I see no reason to take three hundred dollars."

The argument was unanswerable, so one apparently well-baited hook failed to land a "signed statement."

The Duke of Newcastle was "Very Nice"

During a former visit of the Duke of Newcastle I was commissioned to get a "signed statement" from him on the attitude of the English people toward the Established Church. I found the Duke sitting with his entourage, a rather melancholy-looking group of young Englishmen. The Duke himself, a

48 SLIGHTLY DAMAGED SETS for Saturday Evening Post Readers

WRITE TO-DAY AND SECURE A SET AT A BARGAIN

Upon taking stock recently, we find that we have on hand a few slightly damaged sets of the last edition of the "World's Best Music." For all practical purposes, these sets are as good as new. Here and there a leaf is slightly soiled or a binding a little rubbed, but there are no torn pages. Forty-eight of these remaining sets have been reserved for readers of THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, and we offer them, as long as they last, at little more than the cost of making and handling. Write to-day, enclosing the coupon cut from this advertisement, and we will send you a set for examination, and you may return it if it is not satisfactory. Every lover of music will appreciate this opportunity to obtain the world's greatest collection of music at almost cost price. It would cost you over $200.00 if purchased one piece at a time, but if you secure one of the remaining sets, it will cost you one-tenth of that amount, and you may pay in little $1.00 a month payments. This musical collection is indispensable to any pianist or singer.

Size of Volumes, 9 x 12 inches.

A Complete Musical Library

The "Library of the World's Best Music" contains 300 instrumental selections by great composers; melodious, not too difficult, including popular and operatic melodies, dances, funeral marches, and classic and romantic piano music. There are 350 best old and new songs, duets, trios, and quartets. The volumes are illustrated with 400 portraits, many of which are handsome chromatic art plates printed in colors. The work contains 500 biographies of musicians, and more than 100 new and copyrighted selections by American composers. It is the most complete collection of music in existence.

2,200 Pages of Sheet Music

There are 2,200 pages of sheet music, which would cost, if purchased one piece at a time, more than $300.00. The volumes are nearly sheet music size, and are specially bound so as to open flat at the piano. In number of pages of sheet music, number of biographies, and in number of illustrations this Musical Library leads all others. In the preparation of the work twenty editors and special contributors assisted. It has been indorsed by music-loving people in every English-speaking country. Four hundred composers are represented, including such world-famous names as Paderewski, Raffe, Liszt, Wagner, Mozart, Gounod, Beethoven, De Koven, Strauss, Sullivan, and Handel. There are eight volumes in the set, handsomely bound in half-leather or cloth. Size of volumes 9 x 12 inches—nearly sheet music size.

Every Home in Which There is a Piano should possess this splendid musical library, for it doubles the value of a piano as an entertainer. As long as the slightly damaged sets last, they will be sold to SATURDAY EVENING POST readers at $19.00 for sets in half-leather binding and $16.00 for the cloth binding—and you may pay in small payments of $1.00 a month. The amount saved by securing one of the remaining sets is shown by the fact that this musical library sells regularly through the trade at $48.00 and $36.00. Send us the coupon to-day if you wish to secure a set at these prices. We feel confident that you will keep the set after you have examined it, but if it is not entirely satisfactory, you may return it to us at our expense. Do not forget to send the coupon, as this offer is made only to SATURDAY EVENING POST readers.

shy, nervous little man, seemed flattered by the request for a signed story. He evidently stood in great awe of the American newspaper man. But no art could wrench from him sufficient material for a story of the requisite length. So I wound up a most unsatisfactory hour's questioning by saying I would write something for him and bring it the next day. The Duke and his solemn-looking companions listened with great gravity while the story was being read.

"That's very nice," was the only comment the Duke made at the end of the reading. His companions, who evidently took their cue from him in everything, nodded a solemn assent, and so in due time the story appeared over the signature "Newcastle," and was doubtless considered a very fine sample of the "signed statement."

Alexander Bell is Deficient in Humor

Alexander Graham Bell, of telephone fame, proved a singular personage in the matter of appointments. I approached him for a "signed statement" during one of his flying trips to New York. It was a bitter cold night in December, snowing hard, and exceedingly trying to the wayfarer. I saw Bell about eight o'clock in the evening, and had roseate hopes of leaving him with the story in my possession by ten at the latest.

"Yes, certainly," said Mr. Bell, "I shall be pleased to talk to you on the subject. But I am engaged now. Come back again. Er—let me see—about three o'clock in the morning I shall be disengaged and shall be glad to give you an hour or two."

Bell evidently has no sense of humor, for the extraordinary hour named for the appointment was fixed without comment or explanation.

Out into the snow went the writer and three hours after midnight was at the hotel again, expecting to learn that Mr. Bell had gone to bed or left for Washington. But there was Mr. Bell, wide-awake and smiling. With the assistance of several cigars he "gave up" the story. He also volunteered the information that he did most of his work in the small hours of the morning and much preferred the night to the day as a time for wakefulness.

President Patton, of Princeton, was much in demand by the anglers for "signed statements." But to all he returned the same answer: "My price is so much. Will your paper pay it? If not, then don't waste my time."

A brother divine who at that time was more sought after by newspaper men than he is to-day, Dr. Charles H. Parkhurst, was once asked for a "signed statement." It was during the period of anti-vice activity in which Tammany Hall indulged. Doctor Parkhurst was to write about the crusade and incidentally say what he thought about Tammany's sudden accession of virtue.

I was "gunning" for larger game at the time and deputed a fellow-scribe to see Parkhurst. He brought back a glowing story. So beautifully emphatic was it that I wonder now my suspicions were not aroused. It was sent in, however, and the magazine for which it was intended, having occasion to question something in the story, sent a man to Dortor Parkhurst with the manuscript. The reverend reformer promptly denied giving out any statement at all. The magazine held me responsible, so I called at the parsonage.

Simmered down, the trouble was that Doctor Parkhurst objected to some of the words used as not being part of his vocabulary. For instance, the article was besprinkled with such expressions as the "red-light district." This struck the Doctor as being too nearly like the slang of the street for his utterance. The upshot of the matter was that Doctor Parkhurst rewrote the article, making it ten times more emphatic than it was before, and using language that no newspaper man would venture to use.

Andrew Carnegie is Jealous of His Good Name

Andrew Carnegie guarded his signature with jealous care during the run of the "signed statement" craze. While always approachable, the steel king could never be induced to affix his signature to any but the most carefully thought out articles on subjects of his own choosing. "You must use it as an interview or not at all," was his decision regarding a carefully prepared article that was intended to be printed as coming from him. "When my name goes to articles I must write them myself, in my own way and on my own topic. Tear it up if that doesn't suit the editor." And it had to be torn up, for it was a "signed statement" or nothing with that editor. —Harry Dillon Jones.

If You Want Cash

FOR

Your Real Estate

I Can Get It

No matter where your property is located or what it is worth

IF I DID not have the ability and facilities to sell your property, I certainly could not afford to pay for this advertisement. This "ad." (like all of my other "ads.") is practically sure to place on my list a number of new properties, and I am just as sure to sell these properties and make enough money in commissions to pay for the cost of the "ad." and make a good profit besides. That is why I have the largest real estate business in the world to-day.

Why not put your property among the number that will be "listed" and sold as a result of this "ad."?

I will not only be able to sell it,—sometime—but will be able to sell it quickly. I am a specialist in quick sales. I have the most complete and up-to-date equipment in the world. I have branch offices throughout the country and a field force of 2500 men to find buyers.

I do not make any money through the various side lines carried by the ordinary real estate agent. I MUST SELL real estate and lots of it, or go out of business. I can assure you I am not going out of business. On the contrary, I expect to sell twice as many properties during 1903 as I did during 1902, but it will first be necessary for me to "list" more properties. I want to "list" YOURS and SELL it. It doesn't matter whether you have a farm, a home without any land, or a business; it doesn't matter what it is worth or where it is located. If you will fill out the blank letter of inquiry below and mail it to me to-day, I will tell you how and why I can quickly convert your property into cash, and will give you my complete plan (free) and terms for handling it. The information I will give you will be of great value to you even if you should decide not to sell. You had better write to-day before you forget it.

If you want to buy any kind of a Farm, Home, or Business, in any part of the country, tell me your requirements. I will guarantee to fill them promptly and satisfactorily.

A POINT OF HONOR

Being the History of the Barsac-Mariguy Duel as Veraciously Related by Joseph Hornblend

By F. Hopkinson Smith

THE omnibus stopped in the garden, or to be more exact, at the porch of the hotel opening into the garden. Not the ordinary omnibus with a flapping door fastened with a strap leading to the boot-leg of the man on top, a post-office box inside with a glass front, holding a smoky kerosene lamp, and two long pew-cushioned seats placed so close together that everybody rubs everybody else's knees when it is full; not that kind of an omnibus at all, but a wide, low, yellow-painted (yellow as a canary), morocco-cushioned, go-to-the-theatre-in kind of an omnibus drawn by a pair of stout Normandy horses, with two men in livery on the box in front and another on the lower step behind who helps you in and out and takes your bundles and does any number of delightful and courteous things.

This yellow-painted chariot, moreover, was just the kind of a vehicle that should have moved in and out of this flower-decked garden. Not only did its color harmonize with the surroundings—quite as a mass of yellow nasturtiums harmonizes with the peculiar soft green of its leaves—but its appointments were quite in keeping with the luxury and distinction of the place. For only millionaires and princes, and people who travel with valets and maids, and now and then a staid old painter like myself who is willing to be tucked away anywhere, but whose calling is supposed to lend éclat to the Register, are ever to be found there.

The omnibus, then, stopped at the hotel porch and in front of the manager, who stood with a bunch of telegrams in his hand. Behind him smiled the clerk, and on his right bowed the Lord High Porter in gold lace and buttons: everything is done in the best and most approved style at the Baur au Lac in Zurich.

"Did you telegraph, sir? No? Well—let—me—see—Ah, yes! I remember—you were here last year. Number 13. Fritz, on the second floor" (this to a boy), and the manager passed on and saluted the other passengers—two duchesses in silk dusters, a count in a straw hat with a green ribbon, and two Italian noblemen in low collars and mustaches. At least, they must have been noblemen or something better, judging from the profundity of the manager's bow and the alacrity with which Fritz, the boy, dropped my bag and picked up three of theirs.

Another personage now stepped up—a little man with the eyes of a fox—a courier whom I had not seen for years.

"Why, Joseph! where did you drop from?" I asked.

"From the Engadine, my Lord, and I hope Your Lordship is most well."

"Pretty well, Joseph. What are you doing here?"

"It is an Englishman—a lame Englishman—a matter of two weeks only. And you, my Lord?"

"Just from Venice, on my way back to Paris," I answered.

By this time the manager was gazing with his eyes twice their size, and the small boy was standing in the middle of a heap of bags wondering which one of the nobilities he would serve first.

Joseph had now divested me of my umbrella and sketch trap and was facing the manager.

"Did I hear that thirteen was the number of His Lordship's room?" he inquired of that gentleman. "I will myself go. Give me the bag" (this to the boy). "This way, my Lord." And he led the way through the cool hall filled with flowering plants and up a staircase paneled with mirrors. I followed contentedly behind.

Joseph and I are old acquaintances. In my journeyings around Europe I frequently run across him. He and I have had some varied experiences together in our time—the first in Milan at the Hotel Imperial. A young bride and groom, friends of mine—a blue-eyed, sweet-faced young thing with a husband but one year her senior (the two with a £2000 letter of credit, the gift of a doting father)—had wired for rooms for the night at the Imperial. It was about eight o'clock when the couple drove up in one of those Italian hacks cut low-neck—a landau really—with coachman and footman on the box, and Joseph in green gloves and a silk hat on the front seat. My personal salutations over, we all mounted the stairs, preceded by the entire staff with the proprietor at their head. Here on the first landing we were met by two flunkeys in red and a blaze of electric light which revealed five rooms. In one was spread a game supper with every variety of salad known to an Italian lunch counter; in another—the salon—stood a mass of roses the size and shape of a flour barrel; then came a huge bedroom, a bathroom and a boudoir.

The groom, young as he was, knew how little of the letter of credit was left. The bride did not. Neither did Joseph.

"What's all this for, Hornblend?" asked the groom, casting his eyes about in astonishment. Hornblend is the other half of Joseph's name.

"For Monsieur and Madame."

"What! for one night?"

Joseph worked both shoulders and opened his fingers—he had removed his gloves—till they looked like two bunches of carrots.

"Does it not Monsieur please?"

"Please! Do you think I'm a royal family?"

The carrots collapsed, the shoulders stopped and a pained expression overspread Joseph's countenance. The criticisms had touched his heart.

The groom and I put our heads together—mine is gray and I have seen many couriers in my time! His was blond and curly, and Joseph was his first experience.

I beckoned to the proprietor.

"Who ordered this suite of rooms and all this tomfoolery?"

The man bowed and waved his hand loftily toward the groom.

"How?"

"By telegraph."

"Let me see the dispatch."

One of the functionaries—the clerk—handed me the document.

"Is this the only one?"

"Yes."

"It is signed 'Joseph Hornblend,' you see."

"Yes."

"Then let Hornblend pay for it. Now be good enough to show these young people to a bedroom and send your head waiter to me. We will all dine downstairs together in the cafe."

Since that night in Milan Joseph always has called me "My Lord."

He had altered but little. His legs were a little more bowed, the checks of his trousers a trifle larger and the part of his iron-gray hair less regular than in the old days, but the general effect was the same—the same flashy waistcoat, the same long gold watch-chain baited with charms, the same shiny, bell-crown silk hat and the same shade of green kid gloves—same pair, I think. Nor had his manner changed—that cringing, deferential, attentive manner which is so flattering at first to the unsuspecting and inexperienced, and so positive and top-lofty when his final accounts are submitted—particularly if they are disputed. The voice, too, had lost none of its soft, purring quality—a church-whisper-voice with the drone of the organ in it.

And yet withal Joseph is not a bad fellow. Once he knows the size of your pocketbook he willingly adapts his expenditures to its contents. Ofttimes, it is true, there is nothing left but the pocketbook, but then some couriers would even take that. When he is in doubt as to the amount, he tries experiments. I have learned since that the lay-out for the bride and groom that night in Milan was only one of his experiments—the proprietor being co-conspirator. The coach belonged to the hotel; the game supper was moved up from the restaurant, and the flowers had been left over from a dinner the night before. Had they all done duty, Joseph's commissions would have been that much larger. As it was, he collected his percentage only on the coach and the two men on the box and the flunkeys at the head of the stairs. These had been used. The other preparations were only looked at.

Then again, Joseph not only speaks seven languages, but he speaks them well—for Joseph—so much so that a stranger is never sure of his nationality.

"Are you French, Joseph?" I once asked him.

"No."

"Dutch?"

"No."

"What then?"

"I am a Jew gentleman from Germany."

He lied, of course. He's a Levantine from Constantinople, with Greek, Armenian, Hindu and perhaps some Turkish blood in his veins. This combination insures him good temper, capacity and imagination; not a bad mixture for a courier. Besides, he is reasonably honest—not punctiliously so—not as to francs, perhaps, but certainly as to fifty-pound notes—that is, he was while he served me. Of course, I never had a fifty-pound note—not all at once—but if I had had I don't think he would have absorbed it—not if I had signed it on the back for identification and had kept it in a money belt around my waist and close to my skin.

Those things, however, never trouble me. I don't want to make a savings bank of Joseph. It is his vivid imagination that appeals to me—or perhaps the picturesqueness with which he puts things. In this he is a veritable master. His material, too, is not only uncommonly rich, but practically inexhaustible. He knows everybody; has traveled with everybody; has always kept one ear and one eye open even when asleep, and has thus picked up an immense amount of information regarding people and events—mostly his own patrons—the telling of which has served to enliven many a quiet hour while he sat beside me as I painted. Why, once I remember in Stamboul when some Arabs had——

But I forget that I am following Joseph upstairs and that his mission is to see that I am comfortably lodged at the Baur au Lac in Zurich.

When we reached the second floor Joseph met the porter emerging into the corridor with my large luggage. He had mounted the back stairs.

"Let me see Number 13, Porter," cried Joseph. "Ah, yes! it is. Just as I supposed. Is it in that hole you would put my Lord?—where there is noise all the time? You see that window, my Lord?" (By this time I had reached the two disputants and had entered the room.) "You remember, Your Highness, that enormous omnibus in which you have arrived just? It is there that it sleeps." And Joseph craned his head out of the window and pointed in the direction of the courtyard. "When it goes out in the morning at seven o'clock for the train it is like thunder. The Count Monflot had this room. You should have seen him when he was awoke at seven. He was like a crazy man. He pulled all the strings out of the bells, and when the waiter come he had the hat box of Monsieur the Count at his head."

Dismissing the apartment with a contemptuous wave of his hand, Joseph, with the porter's assistance, who had a pass-key, began a search of the other vacant rooms: half the hotel was vacant, I afterward learned; all this telegram and book business was merely an attempt to bolster up the declining days of a bad season.

"Number 21? No—it is a little better, but it's too near the behind stairs. It would be absurd to put His Lordship there. Number 24?"—here he looked into another room, "No, you can hear the grande baggage in the night going up and down. No, it will not do."

The manager, having disposed of the other members of the Emperor's household, now approached with a servile smile fitted to all parts of his face. Joseph attacked him at once.

"Is His Lordship a valet, Monsieur, that you should put him in such holes? Do you not know that he never wakes until ten and has his coffee at eleven, and the omnibus, you know, sleeps there." And he pointed outside. (Another Levantine lie: I am up at seven when the light is right).

Here the porter unlocked another room and stood by smiling. He knew the game was up now, and had reserved this one for the last.

"No—28! Ah, this is something like. Yes, my Lord, this will be quite right. La Contessa Moriarti had this room—yes, I remember." (Joseph never serves any woman below the rank of Contessa.)

So I moved into Number 28, handed Joseph the keys and the porter deposited my luggage and withdrew, followed by the manager. Soon the large and small trunks were disemboweled, my sponge hung on a nail in the window and the several toilet articles distributed in their proper places, Joseph serving in the triple capacity of courier, valet and chambermaid—the lame Englishman being out driving and Joseph, therefore, having this hour to himself. This distribution, of course, was made in deference to my exalted rank and the twenty-franc gold piece which he never fails to get despite my resolutions and which he always seems to have earned despite my knowledge as to how the trick is performed.

Suddenly a crash sounded through the hall as if somebody had dropped a tray of dishes. Then came another and another. Either every waiter in the house was dropping trays or an attack was being made on the pantry by a mob.

Joseph, with a bound, threw back the door and we rushed out.

Just opposite my room was a small salon with the door wide open. In its centre stood a man with an iron poker in his hand. He was busy smashing what was left of a large mirror, its pieces littering the floor. On the sofa lay another man twice the size of the first one, who was roaring with laughter. Down the corridor swooped a collection of guests, porters and chambermaids in full cry, the manager at their head.

"Two hundred and fifty francs, eh—for a looking-glass worth twenty francs?" I heard the man with the poker shout. "I blister with my gas jet one little corner and I must pay two hundred and fifty francs. I have ruined the mirror, have I, eh? And it must be thrown out and a new one put in to-morrow—eh?" Bang! Bang! Here the poker came down on some small fragment still clinging to the frame. "Yes, it will come out—Bang!—all of it will come out."

The manager was now trying to make himself heard. Such words as "my mirror," "outrage," "police," could be heard above the sound of the breaking glass and the shrieks of the man on the sofa, who seemed to be in a paroxysm of laughter.

I looked on for a moment. Some infuriated lodger, angry, perhaps, at the overcharge in his bill, was venting his wrath on the furniture. It was not my mirror and it was not my bill; the manager was present with staff enough to throw both men downstairs if he pleased and without my assistance, and so I turned and reëntered my room. Two things fixed themselves in my mind: the alert figure—trim as a fencer's—of the man with the poker, and the laugh of the fat man sprawling on the lounge.

Joseph followed me into my room and shut the door softly behind him.

"Ah, I knew it was he. No other man is so crazy like that. He would break the head of the propriétaire just the same. That is an old swindle. That mirror has been cracked four—five—six times. The gas jet is fixed so that you must crack it. All the mirrors like the one be burnt—it was only a little spot, I know—go upstairs in the cheap rooms and new ones are brought in for such games. Most always they pay, but Monsieur—it is not like him to pay. He has heard of the trick perhaps—is it not delicious?" and Joseph's face widened into a grin.

"You know him then?" I broke in.

"Know him?—Oh, for many years. He is the great Doctor Barsac. He smashes everything he doesn't like. He smashed that old fat Monsieur who made so much laugh. His name is Mariguy. He looks like a curé, does he not? But he is not a curé: he is an advocate. Barsac is from Basle, but Mariguy lives in Paris. Those two are never separated; they love each other like a man and a wife. There is a great medical convention here in Zurich and Barsac has brought Mariguy with him to show him off. He put a new silver stomach in Mariguy last winter and is very proud of it. It is the great operation of the year, they say."

"What happened to the fat man, Joseph—was it an accident?"

"No—a duel. Barsac ran him through the belly with his sword."

"Permit me, my Lord——" And Joseph stepped to the window. "Yes, there comes the lame Englishman home from the drive. Excuse me—I will go and help him from his carriage." And Joseph bowed himself out backward.

* * * * * * * * * * * * *

II

JOSEPH'S departure left my mind in an unsettled state. I hadn't the slightest interest in the great surgeon who had made the cure of the year, nor the stout advocate with his nickel-plated digestive apparatus. Both of them might have broken every mirror in the hotel and have thrown the fragments out of the window and the manager after them without raising my pulse a beat. Neither did the medical convention nor the doctor's exhibit cause me a moment's thought. Such things were commonplace, and of every-day occurrence. Only the dramatic in life appeals to so staid and gray an old painter as myself, and even Joseph's picturesque imagination could not imbue either one of the incidents of the morning with that desirable quality.

What really did appeal to me as I conjured up in my mind the picture of the fat man sprawled over the sofa cushions roaring with laughter was the duel and the causes that led up to it. Why, if the man was his friend, had the doctor selected the hilarious advocate as an antagonist, and what could have induced the surgeon to pick out that particular section of his friend's surface as his point of attack?

That same night, in the smoking-room of the hotel, Joseph caught sight of me as he passed the open door and moved forward to my table. He had changed his dress of the morning, discarding the inflammatory waistcoat and was now upholstered in a full suit of black. He explained that there were some friends of his living in the village who were going to have some music. The Englishman was in bed and asleep, and now that he was sure that I was comfortable he could give himself some little freedom with his mind at rest.

I motioned him to a seat.

He laid his silk hat and one glove on an adjoining table, spread his coat-tails and deposited himself on the extreme edge of a chair—a position which would enable him to regain his feet at a moment's notice should any of my friends chance to join me. It is just such delicate recognition of my rank and lordly belongings that makes Joseph's companionship ofttimes a pleasure.

"You tell me, Joseph, that that crazy doctor stabbed the fat man in a duel."

"Not stabbed, my Lord! That is not the nice word. It was done So—So—So." And Joseph's wrist, holding an imaginary sword, performed the grand thrust in the air. "He is a master with the rapier. When he was at the Sorbonne he had five duels and never once a scratch. His honor was most paramount. He would fight with anybody, and for the smallest thing. If one man had a longer cane, or wore a higher hat, or took cognac in his coffee. Not for the grisette or for the cards in the face; not so big a thing as that; quite a small thing that nobody would remember a moment. And with his friends always—never with the man he did not before know."

"And was the fat man his friend?"

"His friend! Mon Dieu! they were like the brothers. One—two—five year, I think—all the whole time of the instruction. I was not there, of course, but a friend of mine tell me—a most truthful man, my friend."

"What was the row about? Cognac in his coffee?"

"I do not know—perhaps somethings. Yes, I do remember now. It was the cutting of the hair. Barsac like it short and Mariguy like it long. Barsac tried to cut the hair from Mariguy's head when he was asleep, and then it began. It was in that little wood at the bridge at Surêsne that they went to fight. You know you turn to the right and there is a little place—all small trees—there it was.

"When they all got ready there quickly arrive a carriage all dust and the horse in a sweat and out jumps an old lady—it was Mariguy's mother. Somebody had told her—not Mariguy, of course, but some student. 'Stop,' she cried; 'you do not my son kill. You, Barsac, you do nothing but fight!' Then they all talk and Mariguy say to Barsac: 'It cannot be; my mother, as you see, is old. There is no one but me. If I am wounded she will be in the bed with fright. If I am killed she will be dead. It is my mother, you see, that you fight not me.'

"Barsac take off his hat and bow to Madame." (Joseph had now reached for his own and was illustrating the incident with an appropriate gesture.) "'Madame Mariguy,' said Barsac, 'I make ten thousand pardons. I respect the devotion of the mother.' And he went back to Paris and Mariguy got into the carriage and go away with the mother."

"But, Joseph, of course that was not the last of it?"

"Yes, my Lord, until one year ago."

"Why, did they have another quarrel, Joseph?"

Digitized by Google

"No, not another—never but that one. They were for a long time what you call friends of the bosom. Every day after that they see each other and every night they dine at the Louis d'Or below the Luxembourg. Then pretty soon the doctor, he have to take his degree and come back to Basle to live, and M. Mariguy also have take his degree and become a great advocate in Paris. Every week come a letter from Barsac to Mariguy and one from Mariguy to Barsac."

Joseph stopped in his narrative at this point, noticing perhaps some shade of incredulity across my countenance, and said parenthetically: "I am quite surprised, my Lord, that you have not this heard before. It was quite the talk of Paris at the time. No? Well, then, I will tell you everything as it did happen, for I do assure you that it is most exciting.

"All this time—it was quite ten years, perhaps fifteen—not one word does Monsieur Barsac say to Monsieur Mariguy about the insult of the long hair. All the time, too, they are together. For the summer they go to a little village in the Swiss mountains and for the winter they go to Nice and most every night they play a little at the tables. It was there I met them.

"One morning at Basle the doctor was at his table eating the breakfast when the newspaper is put on the side. He read a little and sip his coffee and then he read a little more—all this, my Lord, was in the papers at the time—I am quite astonished that you have not seen it—and then the doctor make a loud cry, and throw the paper down, run upstairs, pack his bag, jump into a fiacre and go like mad to the station. The next morning he is in Paris, and at the house of his friend Mariguy. In three days they are at Surèsne again—not in the little wood, but in the garden of Monsieur Rochefort, who was his second. It was against the law to go into the little wood to fight, so they took the nearest place to their old meeting—a little sentiment, you see, my Lord, which Monsieur the Doctor always enjoys.

"They toss up for the sun, and Monsieur Barsac he gets the shade. At the first pass—no one is hurt. At the second Monsieur Barsac has a little scratch on his wrist, but no blood. The seconds make inspection most careful. They regret that the encounter must go on, but the honor is not yet satisfied. At the third Monsieur Mariguy made a misstep and Monsieur Barsac's sword go into Monsieur Mariguy's shirt and come out at Monsieur Mariguy's back.

"YES, IT WILL COME OUT—ALL OF IT WILL COME OUT"

"You can imagine what then take place. Doctor Barsac cry in a loud voice that his honor is satisfied and the next moment he is on his knees beside his friend. Monsieur Mariguy is at once put in the bed and for one—two—three months he is dead one day and breathe a little the next. Barsac never leave the house of his friend Monsieur Rochefort one moment—not one day does he go back to Basle. Every night he is by the bed of Monsieur Mariguy. Then comes the critical moment. Monsieur Mariguy must have a new stomach; the old one is like a stocking with a hole in the toe. Then comes the great triumph of Monsieur le Docteur. All Paris come out to see. To make a stomach of silver is to make one the fool, they say. The old doctors shake their heads, but Barsac he only laugh. In one more month Monsieur Mariguy is on his feet and every day walks a little in the Bois near the house of Monsieur Rochefort. In one more month he run, and eat himself full like a boy.

"He is now no longer the great advocate. He is the example of Monsieur Barsac. That is why he is here at the medical convention. They arrived only yesterday and leave to-night. If you turn a little, my Lord, you can see into the other room. There they sit smoking—Ah! do you hear? That is Monsieur Mariguy's laugh. Oh, they enjoy themselves! They have drank two bottles of Marcobrunner already—twenty-five francs each, if you please, my Lord. The head waiter showed me the bottles. But what does Barsac care? He cut everything out of the Prince Morin one day last month and had for a fee fifty thousand francs and the order of St. John."

I bent my head in the direction of Joseph's index finger and easily recognized the two men at the table. The smaller man, Barsac, was even more trim and alert looking than when I caught a glimpse of him in the bedroom. As he sat and talked to Mariguy he looked more like an officer in the French Army than a doctor. His hair was short, his mustache pointed, and his beard closely trimmed. He had two square shoulders and a slim waist and talked with his hands as if they were part of his mental equipment. The other man, Mariguy, the "example," was just a fat, jolly, good-natured Frenchman, who to all appearance loved a bottle of wine better than he did a brief.

Joseph was about to begin again when I stopped him with this inquiry:

"There is one thing in your story, Joseph, that I don't quite get—you say they were students together?"

"Yes, my Lord."

"That the first duel—the one that the mother stopped—was fifteen years ago?"

"Quite true, my Lord."

"And that this last duel was fought a year ago, and that all that time they were together whenever they could be and devoted friends?"

"Every word true, my Lord."

"Well, then, why didn't they fight before?"

Joseph looked at me with a curious expression on his face—one rather of disappointment, as if I had utterly failed to grasp his meaning.

"Fight before! It would have been impossible, my Lord. Barsac's honor was at the stake."

"And he must wait fifteen years," I asked with some impatience, "to vindicate it?"

"Certainly, my Lord—or twice that time if it was necessary. It was only when he read in the paper at the table of his breakfast that morning in Basle that he knew."

"What difference did that make?"

"Every difference, my Lord; Madame Mariguy, the mother, was only the day before dead."

THE LIGHTER SIDE

Horse-Sense and Horse-Play in Congress

By Alfred Henry Lewis

BLACKBURN, in the Senate from Kentucky, was a bluff, back-slapping statesman, albeit, verbally, a wing-shot of much accuracy. Dubois, of Idaho, had just concluded a sharp bicker with the year-frosted Hoar, of Massachusetts. The Bay State Senator had blocked a Dubois bill with a point of order and refused to get out of the way.

"I think," observed the disgusted Dubois to Blackburn, whose seat was next to his own, "I think Hoar the narrowest and most hidebound man in the Senate."

"Sorry, old man," retorted Blackburn, as he lolled back in his chair, "sorry I can't go with you; but the fact is I'm committed to Vilas for that place."

On one occasion Lindsey, who succeeded Carlisle as a Senator from Kentucky, was coming East with Blackburn. It was morning; the train was swaying and rocking through the Allegheny hills; precisely the hour, the motion and the place to remind a gentleman of Blue Grass genesis that he needed a stomachic. Lindsey, returning from the smoking-room, was concerned to note that his colleague's countenance, usually so bland, wore a look of troubled gloom.

"What's wrong?" asked Lindsey anxiously.

"The worst thing in the world," returned Blackburn. "I've lost the better part of my baggage."

"Was it stolen, or did you leave it behind?"

"Neither; the cork came out."

Senator Brice was wont to tell a Blackburn story on himself. While red as a fox when hair and beard were considered, the Ohio statesman was harsh of feature and owned a nose arched like the back of a bucking pony.

"I asked Blackburn," said Brice, "on the heels of a three-months' trip through Europe which he had taken, what he saw to most impress him while abroad.

"'Speak of Satan, etcetera!' exclaimed Blackburn, turning around (he was in converse with Vest at the time), 'why, I was just telling Vest. I was saying to him that I saw at least one hundred pictures of Judas Iscariot in the various galleries I tramped through, and the amazing thing was that while no two of them resembled each other, they all looked like Cal. Brice.'"

Brice, himself, was a Senate force. Like Jefferson, Brice never made a speech—never talked ten words while standing on his feet. Yet such was his power of insinuation and skill for intrigue that he, with Gorman, re-made the Wilson bill from top to bottom and passed it through the Senate with nothing better to work upon than a White House opposition and a Senate majority of one. That was the tariff day when Brice, on Dubois complaining that the schedule on silver-lead ore was not to his Idaho notion, said:

"Why do you complain? This tariff bill is a free lunch. Why don't you step up and help yourself?"

Dubois took the hint and silver-lead ore was thereupon tariffed somewhat more to his taste.

Brice was the political idol of Colonel Ike Hill, the Democratic whip of the House. Colonel Ike hailed from Brice's State of Ohio and made a boast of the purity and rock-ribbed character of his Democracy.

"My son," said Colonel Ike solemnly, when an inquisitive young man of the newspapers craved to know his age—"my son, I don't want you to print it, because, d'ye see, I'm letting it go 'round here in Washington that I'm only sixty-three. But, between you and me, son, I voted for Franklin Pierce. Yes, sir," continued Colonel Ike, warming as he thought of his record, "I've been a voting Democrat for going on sixty years. I was a Democrat in old Licking County throughout the war, and when the Republicans used to hunt 'em with dogs. For years the issue on which the Republicans of Licking used to run their candidate for sheriff was:

Will you kill
Ike Hill?"

Colonel Ike was in the office of Beriah Wilkins, publisher of the Washington Post, when he furnished these splinters of his past. Across the room sat a very old man. The sight of the aged patriarch enlisted the attention of Colonel Ike.

"How old be you, Uncle Joe?" asked Colonel Ike.

"I'm eighty-eight years old, Ike," piped the old man.

"Eighty-eight years old!" repeated Colonel Ike, surveying his white-haired friend in a mood of thoughtful admiration. Then lapsing into the language of the green-cloth, whereof in younger days he knew a deal—"Eighteen years on velvet!"

Brice, during the fight which Cleveland from the White House was waging for sound money, went personally to his State Convention at Springfield and carried it for gold. Colonel Ike, who had been day and night for silver, was a delegate. On his return to Washington he was questioned as to where he stood when now his State had declared for the single standard.

"I'm for gold," quoth Colonel Ike stoutly. "I was a silver bug and now I'm a gold bug, and I will be a diamond bug if the party declare for diamonds as the unit of value. I'm not going to be lost; I'm a Democrat first, last and always, and if the party flops, Ike Hill flops with it. I can turn so quick the heels of my moccasins will be in front."

One Thing the Horse Could Do

VANCE, of North Carolina, was a shagbark personage of the old Andrew Jackson school. He never wearied of poking fun at Ransom, his colleague. This latter gentleman was the opposite of Vance. There was nothing of the shagbark about Ransom; he was essentially the showcase Senator, was dressed as accurately as an artist might paint a picture, and wore little, glossy, glove-tight boots, the mere looks whereof would pinch one's feet. Although the Brummel of the Senate, Ransom was not a publicist of weight or profundity, and Vance did the work for their State, while Ransom gleamed and glistened.

"The other day, Ransom," said Vance, when the two, with others, were in the cloakroom one dull afternoon—Morgan was talking for a Panama Canal and the cloakrooms were crowded—"the other day when I was down in Raleigh I heard a compliment for you."

"And what was that?" asked Ransom, to whom praise was as a flower to his nose.

"As I was sitting in front of the tavern," went on Vance, "a black boy led out a horse for exercise. The horse was wrapped in a blanket, and all across in big red letters was the name 'Matt Ransom.'

"'I see you've named your horse after Senator Ransom,' I said.

"'Yassir,' responded the black boy.

"'Is he a fast horse?' I asked. 'Can he run?'

"'No, sah, he can't run none. He's a mighty slow hoss, sah.'

"'Can't be trot?' I inquired.

"'Sho! trot?' says the black boy. 'No, sah, he can't trot a little bit. Any ol' cow could pass him.'

"'Well, then,' I insisted, 'what's all this fuss about—with your blanket and you leading him about for exercise? What's he named after Senator Ransom for?'

"'Why, as I states,' explained the black boy, 'he can't trot an' he can't run; but all d' same dish yere hoss has his p'ints. Most of all, sah, he's a pow'ful fine prancer.'"

As displaying the uncertainties of politics and showing how trouble may, without blame on his part, brew for a gentleman in high station, a story might be told of Dubois.

The Idaho Senator was nothing old for years, and it is to be presumed that Mrs. Carlisle, when she so inadvertently laid the foundations of his grief, did not identify him as a member of that severe Senate body. Mrs. Carlisle was at the head of a circle of ladies who were raising money for the rehabilitation of Andrew Jackson's tomb which, so ran a Tennessee story, was falling to decay. They were about to give an exhibition in one of the Washington theatres, a first element of the show being a minuet in costume and danced after the slow and stately fashion of the days of old.

When a Senator "Verged on the Giddy"

DUBOIS, who was six feet tall, and as slim and straight as an Indian, caught Mrs. Carlisle's eye as he sat next her at a dinner given by the Brices. It occurred to the wife of the Secretary of the Treasury that the lithe and active Dubois was, for age and size and look, exactly the thing for a minuet. Acting on the instant impulse, she proposed that Dubois should lead the minuet, dressed in the garb of a bull-fighter of Seville. Dubois readily assented, deeming the affair a merry jest.

The next day, however, when he saw himself announced in the society columns of the local paper as on the minuet program—for the lady had learned his name in the interim and was more than pleased to think she had won to her aid so illustrious a dancer—the humor of the situation began sensibly to fade. It grew less and still less when the story reached Idaho and the papers of his home region proceeded to comment thereon with Roman sternness.

> "Fred Dubois," observed one imprint, in effect—it was some such publication as the Weekly Yell of Warwhoop Crossing, if I mistake not—"Fred Dubois as a Senator is becoming a shade too frivolous. We note by our Eastern exchanges that he has booked up with an outfit to dance a minuet in knee-breeches ornamented with white lace ruffles. Dubois was brought up in a rattlesnake country and can make a backward jump of twelve feet, and no one doubts, therefore, his ability to shine out in a minuet. Still it is slightly verging on the giddy, not to say the heartless, for Fred, at a time when hard times has got his State treed and out on a limb, to be back East dancing minuets. If it were a lariat polka now, or a pocatello reel, it wouldn't seem so bad; but for Fred to be strutting through a chill, callous minuet—doing it on a cold collar, mind you!—and we, his constituents, jumping sidewise for grub, raises within us feelings which 'lay over' anything we ever experienced, like four kings and an ace. Like the old lady in the Tennessee Mountains, after hearing for the first time of the Crucifixion and shedding tears for an hour, all we can do is look up between our sobs and say, 'Parson, let's hope it ain't so.'"

That minuet story ran about in Idaho like fire in dry grass. It had not a trifle to do with the defeat of Dubois when he sought a reëlection. He is again in the Senate, but it took six years of retirement to live down that unfortunate minuet.

Everything one sees in Washington has a reason if one can but turn it out; one may be sure that nothing governmental comes by chance. Now and again, however, it would be hard to arrive at the cause of some given phenomenon unless one had a guide. It was during the last year of the ice-cold Harrison's administration, and when Crisp was Speaker of the House. The fact was noticed curiously by House members that when Crisp would leave the chair he called frequently on Dockery, of Missouri—he is now Governor of that State—to take his place and preside. The distinction gave Dockery limitless satisfaction, as any one might see.

While the joy it gave Dockery to wield the House gavel was patent to all, the reason why Crisp should so honor him was by no means clear. Dockery had been a staunch adherent of Mills throughout the hot caucus fight for the Speakership and there lived no visible claim on his part for these particular favors of Crisp. Why was Crisp so persistently calling Dockery to play at being Speaker? That was a question which held the House on tiptoe.

One afternoon, while a select coterie were in the cloakroom, the question was asked of General Catchings, of Mississippi; Catchings was Crisp's right-hand man on the House floor.

The Great Dockery Miracle

"THE miracle of Dockery in the chair," said Catchings, "can readily be explained. I'm the guilty party and the story runs like this: The thing I'm most afraid of is that Harrison, up in the White House, will name a negro to be postmaster at Vicksburg. To prevent that dark calamity I have to get Bruce, who was aforetime Senator from Mississippi and is just now Register of Deeds for the District of Columbia, to go to Harrison and argue against it. To get Bruce to interpose his word and influence I have to get Dockery, who, as chairman of a sub-committee on the Committee of Appropriations, has Bruce more or less under his gun, to exert his influence with Bruce. Lastly, to get Dockery to thus exercise himself with Bruce for my benefit I have to see to it that Crisp, at reasonable intervals, lets Dockery preside over the House. It's a pleasure to both Crisp and me at that, since it so fills and overflows the Dockery cup of bliss. That's all there is, gentlemen, to the wonder of Dockery in the chair. Whenever you see Dockery handling the gavel you may be sure that Harrison, at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue, is not appointing a black postmaster for Vicksburg."

The House is a ruder and more exuberant convention than the Senate, and the members will unbuckle and take liberties with one another in debate which would shock the Senate—with its courtesies—to its dignified heart. It was under the "Five-minute rule" and Snodgrass, of Tennessee, arose for the purpose of replying to Jerry Simpson, who, it would seem, had charged Snodgrass, inferentially at least, with the triangular offense of being a lawyer, a fop and a fool. Snodgrass was a dull, tedious, drawling fashion of orator and could set the House nerves on more desperate edge than any other in the chamber. He was proceeding in a manner which he meant should be pompously satirical to crush the guileless Simpson.

"Mr. Speaker," drawled Snodgrass, while the House writhed to be rid of him—"Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas has preferred an indictment against me in three counts. In the first count, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas charges me with being a lawyer——"

"We'll nolle that count," interjected Reed from his seat on the Republican side. "Let the gentleman go on to the next."

"Acting," continued the wearisome Snodgrass with the same exasperating drawl, "acting on the suggestion of my eminent friend from Maine, Mr. Speaker, I will now go on to the second count of the indictment preferred against me by the gentleman from Kansas. In the second count, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas charges me with being a fop and accuses me, Mr. Speaker, of wearing clothes. I must say, Mr. Speaker"—this with a lofty sneer, full of a spirit of patronage toward the "sockless" Simpson—"I do wear clothes. I might add, Mr. Speaker, that I not only wear clothes when now I am a member of Congress, but, Mr. Speaker, I wore clothes before ever I came to Congress——"

"Just a moment!" broke in Caruth, of Kentucky; "will the gentleman please state how long?"

There came another burst of laughter which would seem to fall as pleasantly on the Snodgrass ear as did the first. He beamed through the uproar like a tarnished sun and when it finished he again took up his oration where Caruth had broken in.

"Mr. Speaker," resumed the pernicious Snodgrass, "the third and last count of the indictment preferred against me by the gentleman from Kansas is that I'm a fool."

"Bang!" came Crisp's gavel. "The gentleman's time has expired!"

Snodgrass looked helplessly about; his five minutes were up; he must leave his defense to that third count floating in the air. It was the amiable Simpson himself who would push to the Snodgrass rescue.

"Mr. Speaker," said Simpson, "I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time to speak on that third count be extended five minutes. If the House will grant my request he'll prove it."

When Mrs. Pugh Smelled a Rat

PUGH, of the Senate, and Vest, the then senior statesman from Missouri, were as Jonathan and David. They had been in the Confederate Congress together, and as Vest said "had feared that they might hang as traitors together" and owned many memories in common.

One evening the two had been with Harris, of Tennessee, on Capitol Hill. The weakness of Harris was penny-ante; he played penny-ante nightly, and since he made them play when others failed him, had worn out three secretaries with the game. Harris' motto might have been one with that of the Pinkertons: "I never sleep."

It stood but 11:30 of the clock when Vest and Pugh were about their return. Pugh was a giant in stature, while Vest was physically the smallest man of the Senate; it was but natural, therefore, that Vest should take charge of Pugh whenever they went abroad. On this night, fulfilling his duty as guardian, Vest decided that Pugh might better take a late supper. To that good end Vest had Pugh into a restaurant of the vigorous German sort.

Among other delicacies and for the first time in his career, Pugh was made acquainted with Limburger cheese. Pugh was delighted with the confection. Pugh became eloquent as to its merits; it was such an unstudied, unaffected, sincere form of cheese that he couldn't say too much for it. He would have home a specimen; its virtues should be made clear to the household of Pugh, to the end that thereafter it be ever on the family bill-of-fare.

The proprietor, immensely flattered and moved by Pugh's admiration for this favorite German regale, presented Pugh with an entire cheese wrapped in the original tinfoils. Pugh received it gratefully and stowed it away in the sternsheets of his dress coat. Then he went home.

Pugh hung his dress coat in a closet and forgot about the tinfoil package in its pocket. The next morning, still forgetful, he arose, donned his every-day suit, repaired to the Capitol and went to passing laws for seventy millions of his countrymen.

It was five o'clock in the dusk of a winter's day when Pugh, his law-passing over for the day, again entered his home. There were signs and symptoms to meet him which he did not understand. The doors were open and the windows up. The chill blasts of January were roving through the rooms. The feminine Pughs were gathered in the library, wrapped in furs. And abroad in the premises there were gentry in overalls who ripped up the flooring, sawed holes in the wainscot and did other deeds common to gasfitters and plumbers who truly love their art.

"What does all this mean?" roared Pugh.

"We can't stay in the house unless it's found," replied Mrs. Pugh from out her furs, wherein she was swaddled like an Eskimo.

"Unless what's found?" demanded the amazed statesman.

"There's a dead rat somewhere," returned Mrs. Pugh, "and it simply must be found."

Then Pugh bethought him of the cheese, sullen and morose, a forgotten capture in the pocket of his dress coat.

A negro, who looked on life as a failure and cared not to stay, was given four bits, and by him the contribution was carried far to leeward; the ravages of the visiting gasfitters were then repaired, confidence was restored and peace again settled about the gables of Pugh.

BROKERAGE AS A BUSINESS FOR YOUNG MEN

By Alfred L. Baker

Former President of the Stock Exchange, Chicago

IN NO other business is the candle of human vitality burned as rapidly as it is in the broker's office. The man who cannot stand sustained work under high pressure has no place in this calling and had better keep out of it.

For this reason the young man who contemplates becoming a stock-broker should subject himself to candid self-examination before making it his choice for a life career. It is not enough that he should feel himself fully equal to a steady grind of hard work, or even to an uncommon degree of close mental application. He may be above the average in both physical and mental ruggedness and still be unfitted for this particular, exacting and strenuous line of commercial effort.

Before he casts the die in favor of this calling let him ask himself: "Am I endowed with a disposition which will enable me to endure excitement with comparative complacency and at the same time to work at 'concert pitch'?" Both of these requirements are essential to success in brokerage. Not possessing these characteristics, a broker is liable to give out at a most important and critical time.

Still other qualifications must not be overlooked. First of these is the broker's instinct. Unless a young man feels a natural and compelling inclination to get into the swift stream of the Exchange he should stifle his ambitions to shine as a broker. This instinct differs from the taste for the slower barter and sale of industrial products as the instinct of the thoroughbred race horse differs from the plodding disposition of the draught horse. Time, it is said, is the essence of all contracts, but especially does this apply to the transactions on the Stock Exchange floor, where time means instant action.

The Value of Making Friends

SO MUCH for the qualifications demanded in the actual discharge of the brokerage business; but business must be got before it is transacted, and it therefore follows that the young man who is equipped for this calling must possess the faculty for getting trade as well as the ability to handle it. A friendly approach to the world at large—to the chance acquaintance as well as to the intimate associate—is a prime requisite in the bearing of the young broker, for it is mainly by this means that he will enlarge the list of his customers. Many a broker has lost thousands of dollars in commissions which would have been his had he not repulsed the stranger who chanced to be introduced to him on the street, in the club, at the summer resort, or wherever men of the world are wont to meet in casual intercourse.

At the outset of his career the young man who elects to follow this business and follow it successfully must make up his mind that he will be a broker only and not a trader—that is, not a speculator himself.

Ninety-nine out of every hundred who have attempted to be traders and speculators on their own account have ended in disaster. Having once determined that he will be a broker he should steel himself to look without covetousness upon the profits of his customers and not allow these to tempt him upon a path of personal speculation. A broker who plays the market is a house divided against itself which must fall.

Naturally, the first thing for the novice in the broker's office to master is a knowledge of the terms and phrases peculiar to the business. Most beginners gain this information in the routine of their daily tasks, but their progress might be materially facilitated by a little home study. The only textbook required is one of the pamphlets used by the leading brokerage offices for distribution among the customers and prospective customers, and distributed as advertising matter.

Commercial printing-houses largely patronized by brokers furnish these pamphlets in large quantities. In addition to a comprehensive definition of brokerage terms and phrases these booklets generally contain the principles governing transactions on the New York Stock Exchange, and also a description of the processes by which such transactions are effected, together with a collection of miscellaneous information of a technical character which the beginner must thoroughly understand before he can grasp the meaning and ramifications of a trade. The pamphlet of this character which happens to be at hand is issued by the Financial Publishing Company, Chicago.

A Valuable Course of Study

WHEN the beginner in the broker's office has learned the terms of the business and gained a general idea of its processes he may at once begin a course of study which is ample enough to satisfy the energies of the most ambitious and tireless student. Although there is a broad and definite foundation to be laid in this line of research, and one which will prove a substantial and abiding asset, the oldest as well as the youngest broker must faithfully pursue this line of inquiry or he will be a poor counselor for his customers and must speedily become a "back number."

This important field of study is found in the official literature of the great railroad organizations of the country, for the stocks, bonds and securities of these corporations are the principal commodities in which the broker traffics. Mainly this literature is in the form of the annual reports of the various railway companies and they are obtained by application to the railway offices. Brokers are generally supplied with these bulky volumes and are glad to give studious employees access to them.

The value of a careful perusal of these documents is easily indicated. Foreknowledge of values or of their general trend is the one thing to be desired by the broker. Of course, he is never able actually to know that a certain railway security will advance or decline to a given limit, but it is his business—and the very essence of his business—so to inform himself on the conditions governing the values of that security that he may form a practical opinion of the merits of the property.

In the annual reports of the railroads the student will find the materials from which to build a foundation knowledge of the great properties, and this foundation will at all times serve him as a basis for calculations on the one essential point regarding any security: its dividend-paying power.

After learning the main traffic dependence of each road—whether lumber, wheat, corn, live-stock, fruit, coal, oil, manufactured products or a combination of several of these elements—let him dig into the finances of the company, the condition of the property, the personnel of the management and controlling shareholders.

What has the road cost? What is the condition of the property; of the physical plant, consisting of roadbed, rails, rolling-stock, shops, stations and buildings? How much does the company owe and what are the terms of interest and payment governing its various debts? Are costly improvements or extensions in progress? If so, how are the funds for these to be provided—from the surplus, from current earnings or from special issues of bonds? Is the percentage of operating expenses on the increase or decrease? Are any new and promising industrial developments, such as may be expected to swell the dividends of the company, coming to the front in the territory of the road? Are any large expansion movements planned or imminent which, although of a sound character, will temporarily decrease the dividend percentage? Or is there a falling away in any source of traffic which will tend to produce a shrinkage of the earnings of the road?

But the value of this groundwork of research will depend upon the quickness and intelligence with which the young broker applies this knowledge in relation to current events, to labor and crop conditions in the various sections of the country, to discoveries of mineral, oil and other valuable deposits, to the activity in special lines of manufacture and commerce. Unless he can put together the information gained from the morning paper, from the financial journal, from the ticker tape and from correspondence and conversation, and combine it with the knowledge gained from the railroad report, he will be working in the dark, guessing upon "general conditions," and following impulses.

No amount of intuition can take the place of definite knowledge of securities and of the elements which have made and will make their values.

This must be supplanted by a large amount of information of a less definite and authentic kind which must come to him in conversation and general talk. Although the "gossip of the street" is often misleading, it cannot be ignored, and the young broker must accept or reject it according to his own best judgment. In many, and perhaps most, instances he may be able to judge of its worth by reference to his knowledge of the road and its management. So far as possible he should learn something of the character of the men who dictate the policy of each great property. Another important thing for him to learn is who are the smaller as well as the larger holders of securities—particularly of those likely to be eagerly sought after? There is no rule by which this information is to be obtained aside from the very general one of keeping one's ears always open.

Nothing will take the place of a regular and careful reading of one or more of the ablest financial journals of the day. The ambitious young broker will do well to read closely The Commercial and Financial Chronicle, of New York, and The Economist, of Chicago. For a view of the foreign market the London Statist is to be commended. These journals are very sound and reliable, and will greatly assist in the education of the young broker—an education which, to a peculiar degree, is never finished until he quits.

While digging after the hard facts in the railroad reports and the current financial papers, the student will find it both pleasant and helpful to read some of the more entertaining literature of the Exchange. His ambitions will be sharpened and his knowledge of personalities greatly enlarged by the perusal of Mr. Henry Clews' delightful and chatty volume of reminiscences, called Twenty-Eight Years in Wall Street, and published by the Irving Publishing Company, New York.

A List of Useful Reading

ANOTHER interesting and unique work is Benners' Prophecies. This deals with the rise and fall of prices and the various theories regarding the principles underlying price movements. Much that is curious and entertaining is here mixed with considerable information of a useful character.

Of solid books there are many which may well find their way into the library of the young man who is determined systematically to study for brokerage as he would for a profession. Poors' Manual of Railroads (H. V. & W. H. Poor, New York), and Moody's Manual of Industrial and Miscellaneous Securities (O. C. Lewis Co., 6 Wall Street, New York), are essential. In connection with the latter volume it should be said that information regarding the industrial securities is exceedingly difficult to obtain, as these institutions do not issue anything in the line of official literature which corresponds with the elaborate annual reports put out by the railroad companies.

Another excellent handbook of this class is the Manual of Statistics, edited by Henry E. Wallace, and published by Chas. H. Nicoll, New York. This covers all kinds of securities. American Investments Classified is a useful volume by Curtis G. Harraman, 35 Nassau Street, New York. Its information is taken from official sources and relates to investors as well as investments of all classes.

American Street Railway Investments, issued as a supplement to the Street Railway Journal, 120 Liberty Street, New York, is a valuable annual which covers, in a very comprehensive and systematic way, the entire street railway situation of this country, giving the population of every city or town in the country having a surface system, the conditions governing franchises, the amount and nature of stock and bond issues, the time of annual meetings, and the value of plants and equipment.

If the young broker has followed the course of study indicated as essential to his groundwork and still longs for more, he may well spare the time to read Maurice L. Muhleman's Monetary Systems of the World, published by Chas. H. Nicoll, New York. However, he should remember that much of the reading here suggested is of a perpetual character, that the crop of official reports and annuals is perennial, and that the broker who is thoroughly alive must keep up with this fresh harvest of information.

AN EARLY WRECK

BY WILL PAYNE

CRESSET himself manipulated the ink-roller, for that part of the operation required most judgment. His daughter Lydia fastened the sheets of white paper in the fly and lowered this fly over the bed of type. Bob Terhune pulled at the lever which rolled the bed under the press, then gave a mighty jerk to make the imprint. In this way Number 1, Volume I of the Blue Ridge Eagle was printed.

The press lever was as big as a kitchen rolling-pin. Bob grasped it with both hands. The sleeves of his hickory shirt were turned up to the elbows. He wore a long inky apron. Perspiration dripped from his face. He jerked so hard that the floor, where the feet of the press were screwed down, hopped up a little at every imprint. But he had never been so happy before in his life.

Cresset's shirt-sleeves were rolled up and he had daubed himself with ink like a Sioux with war-paint. There was ink in his red whiskers and even a smutch on his high, bald, shiny forehead—for the editor was only an amateur, having given up his twenty-year job as assistant station agent and telegraph operator in Marmion, Ohio, only a month before. But the very smell of the ink was a joy to him, for here he was with his newspaper at last.

Lydia Cresset laughed over her work. She alone was spotless. With the broad, white sheets of unprinted paper she had made a pair of enormous cuffs to go over the sleeves of her cotton waist, and a bib, pinned on before, and a mob cap that sat jauntily over her yellow, fluffy hair. In the small, staid town of Marmion, Ohio, the lifelong job of assistant station agent had fixed the family's caste. Miss Lydia was happy to get away. In Blue Ridge she felt herself already becoming a success. She was twenty-seven, with light blue eyes and a kind of fragile, somewhat faded prettiness.

The paper cuffs and cap had a certain picturesqueness. Bob Terhune looked that way again and again with a helpless and guilty dumbness and a happily quaking heart. He was a size and a half larger than Cresset and seventeen years old. His hands and feet seemed to have outgrown the rest of him. When for the second time Lydia glanced up and caught him looking at her in that helpless and dumbly guilty way, he turned red and gave so mighty a jerk on the lever that he nearly wrenched the press from the floor.

The room was shedlike, without ceiling or plaster. Its bare ribs of two-by-four pine scantling were new as when they came from the mill, and in the unpainted floor of smooth boards the heads of the nails shone fresh and sharp as new-minted coins. Everything in Blue Ridge was that new. The main street was hardly more than a dusty wagon track over the prairie grass. The half-dozen store buildings either shone with spotlessly clean boards and shingles or glistened and smelled with new paint. The ties, rails and spikes of the railroad track looked too new to be used. From the clean plank platform of the little station one could look across the floor of green prairie and see the construction gang, with its smoking engine, cars and derrick, laying the ties and rails, and the long, diminishing line of clay grading, brand-new and straight as a ruler, running on across the level, untouched land toward the Rocky Mountains. The great floor of prairie swelled gently up to Blue Ridge. The view was unbroken for many miles. There were no trees—only the vast reach of green land with a great high blue sky above it. And this landscape, too, seemed new, as though it had just been made and the improvements had not yet been put in. The new boards and shingles of Blue Ridge seemed proper to it. All gave an effect of freshness, of a place untouched and unmarred, where everything might be hoped for.

Every one in Blue Ridge responded to this exhilarating effect of freely offered, untrammeled opportunity.

And the town was growing almost miraculously. The handful of first settlers—now two months old in that dignity—had fully prepared themselves to be astonished in this respect; but the astonishment outran their preparation. The first number of the Eagle counted up fourteen separate business enterprises already either actually established or practically assured, beginning with P. A. Trimble's mammoth elevator and corncrib and J. F. Hensen's spacious, well-stocked general store, and ending with D. J. Duffy, an able blacksmith and wheelwright, who was looking for a location, a shop and some tools.

Well toward the head of the list appeared "James E. Tyce, attorney and counselor-at-law, who has already taken up quarters at the Blue Ridge House, and whose shingle will soon be flung to the breeze from the new offices in the Hensen Block." The Hensen Block was the only two-story building so far.

The shingle was flung to the breeze early in the Eagle's second week. Tyce contemplated it from his comfortable wooden chair under the board awning of the Blue Ridge House across the street. In spite of Blue Ridge's astonishing growth there was not much to do as yet but sit around and wait for some business to turn up.

The lawyer was forty-five, angular, with a face that looked concave from the prominent brow above and the projection of stiff black whiskers below. His eye was watery. He wore a presentable long frock coat, well brushed, a clean standing collar and starched shirt, and a black slouch hat. He had done nothing in particular for a week save take his meals regularly at the one long pine table in the unplastered dining-room of the Blue Ridge House. But he had at once become a leading citizen—perhaps the leading citizen.

He looked up at the sign which swung from an arm that projected from the window-casing in the second-story, and he commented to himself: "If I were really as bright as some people think me, now, I suppose I'd go up and hang myself there instead of a shingle—'Our able fellow-citizen, James E. Tyce, Esquire, flung himself to the breeze in front of the Hensen Block at ten o'clock last Tuesday. Mr. Tyce had a fine mind and a long figure that looked well hanging'—if I could get the editor to put it in that way I guess I'd do it."

Nevertheless, James E. Tyce, Esquire, was sensible of the fine brand-newness. The mellow, flattering June day over that great open world of prairie could not have been improved. He had even been genuinely interested in the tremendous news that Blue Ridge was to have a bank at once. Everything came at once if it came at all. On Monday a carload of brick arrived at Blue Ridge. That in itself was sensational, and immediately every one knew that when Sam Sutton, of Tremont, bought the lot next the post-office two weeks before it had really been to put a bank on it. But the secret had been kept lest somebody else should rush in ahead.

Two wagon-loads of brick had already been hauled past the Blue Ridge House that morning. A trench two feet deep outlining a parallelogram forty feet long and eighteen wide had been dug in the Sutton lot. The bricklayer, imported like the brick from Tremont, had mixed his box of mortar. Where the principal occupation was watching the town grow these vigorous indications that Blue Ridge was to have a bank, and a brick bank, out of hand, overcame all other interests. A group of men stood on the rank, trodden and dusty grass where the sidewalk would be and watched with deep interest while the mason leveled the bottom of the trench and settled a plank into place—this being the only foundation needed. Sutton was there, a fat, youngish man with stubbly whiskers, who looked as though a bath would do him good. Beside him stood a new figure—Hynes, who was to be junior partner in the bank, a tall man with a thick yellow beard. Trimble, Hensen, Duffy and other leading citizens were there. Lafe had come out of his "place" in his white bar-keeper's apron, and looked on with good-humored approval.

LYDIA CRESSET AND BOB TERHUNE

Across the road Bob Terhune stared from the window of the Eagle office in his inky apron, a "stick" in which he had been putting type with slow, infinite pains still in his awkward hand. Miss Lydia, a "stick" in her hand, pressed against him and peered over his shoulder, so that his heart pumped in the base of his throat with a kind of painful ecstasy and his hand trembled.

"Oh, they're going to lay the corner-stone! I'm going over," said Miss Lydia excitedly. She put down the "stick" and tore off the paper cuffs, still looking out of the window. "There comes Mr. Tyce. Maybe he'll make a speech," she cried with a new flutter, and ran out bareheaded.

Tyce, moving leisurely up the street, saw Miss Lydia coming across the road, and stopped. His tall, angular figure drew itself up in a martial way. He lifted his black slouch hat and made her a bow which—as Miss Lydia was rather acutely aware—could not have been matched elsewhere in Blue Ridge. She stepped beside him with a little, well-preserved, maidenly laugh of self-consciousness, and they walked to the bank together. The workman, in his limy clothes, held a brick in one hand, a trowel in the other.

Trimble spoke up. "Say, this here's a sort o' Fourth of July. We oughtar have a speech by rights." He looked at Tyce, a-grin.

"Sure! A speech," said Hensen.

"That's right! A speech!" said Duffy.

"Well, gentlemen, if you elect me orator of the day on such short notice," said Tyce. He stepped down beside the workman, took off his hat gravely and faced the knot of loafing men amid their few dots of brand-new pine houses on the great floor of green new prairie.

"On another memorable occasion another orator imagined a child lifting a corner of the curtain and peeping at the glorious future of America. But that orator never imagined so far as to behold the foundation of a great institution of finance on the trackless brim of the American desert. We stand at the joint between the old and the new, at the surf-line, as you may say. While with one hand we inherit the virgin soil from the shiftless Indian and the migratory buffalo, with the other we inherit all that civilized man has accomplished. We bring commerce, education, all the arts and graces"—here he turned his grave, oratorical face to Duffy, who had stopped chewing his tobacco in admiration and was absently scratching his ankle with the toe of his wrinkled cowhide boot—"all the arts and graces to plant them in a new soil, as we plant this brick." He lowered his voice to a more conversational tone. "The soil is rich, gentlemen. We can make this seed-brick grow like a Jonah's gourd into stores, warehouses, offices, long streets of prosperous business, by a husbandry of faith, works and good will."

"Well, by Jinks, that's all right, too!" Duffy exclaimed loudly, looking around at Trimble, who nodded approval.

Tyce had put on his hat, but he spoke up again. "It occurs to me that we need another hand. A woman dedicates the ship. I think a woman ought to lay the corner-stone—whether it's a brick or not."

Miss Lydia, the only woman present, blushed slightly with her little, well-preserved, maidenly laugh.

"Sure! Of course!" Everybody seconded the motion. Tyce took off his hat, reached up his hand gallantly and assisted Miss Lydia to skip, not too ungracefully, into the trench. Her gentle hand, guided by the rude hand of the good-natured workman, laid the brick in place.

When Tyce and Miss Lydia came up to the strip of trampled grass where the sidewalk should have been they paused a moment, talking. Tyce was aware that the better part of his late audience was stringing into Lafe's Place, some with a backward glance over the shoulder, and that Lafe, who stood holding open his hospitable door, was looking toward him expectantly. But he walked across the street to the Eagle office with Lydia Cresset, and loitered before the door a moment gallantly.

Bob Terhune had witnessed the ceremony from the window of the Eagle office, had seen Miss Lydia meet the lawyer, helped into the trench to lay the brick, helped out again; had seen the first loitering, the stroll across the street. Tyce was the big man, the capable hero of the occasion. Miss Lydia kept looking up at him with her little self-conscious laugh.

Bob could scarcely see the boxes of type at which his big, stumbling fingers slowly picked. He had a miserable underconsciousness that he was setting half the letters wrong side up, instead of only a quarter, as usual. But he seemed unable to help that. He stumbled along with it, his aching heart as heavy as lead. He knew that Tyce ate at the table with her at the Blue Ridge House, anyway.

Meantime Tyce was strolling back to the hotel. "I suppose I'd better have taken the drinks while everybody was setting 'em up," he reflected. "Next time I want a drink and do take it I'll have to pay for it." He had twelve dollars to his name.

After the corner-stone things moved swimmingly. Editor Cresset was in a continual state of joyous excitement over the rumors of important additions to Blue Ridge's business. Most of the rumors turned out to be baseless, and the paper was not exactly paying as yet—that is, he was not getting enough real money out of it to pay the twelve or thirteen dollars a week that the white paper, printed on one side with "patent insides," cost him. He thought he could get an extension of the mortgage on the outfit, however, and altogether his prospect looked very hopeful.

The wall of the new bank was a foot above the ground, and Bob was looking over at it miserably, for Mr. Tyce had loitered in and was talking to Lydia. It was Saturday—always a sort of fair—and there were more than a dozen farm wagons in town.

Those in the Eagle office heard a pistol shot, a mortal scream, another pistol shot.

Men were running and shouting. There was the piercing wail of a woman's voice, yells and oaths. The little town seemed suddenly thrown into fury.

Miss Lydia began crying and wringing her hands and flung herself hysterically upon her father, who was about to rush out.

"No! No! You'll be killed! No! No! Oh, what is it? What is it?"

Tyce's angular form was drawn up straight. "Don't be afraid," he said tersely. "It's just a row!"

Bob, wide-eyed, a-tremble with excitement, ran to the door, "stick" in hand. He was confusedly uncertain what to do. He looked over his shoulder at Lydia, crying and clinging hysterically to her father, and up the street to the butcher's tiny shop, where the men were surging in. He heard shouts, parts of words, that piercing wail of a woman's voice.

The young Swede, Hensen's clerk, ran by with his store apron on, and as he ran by he explained wildly to Bob, "He is kill Hermann the butcher: now he be hang!"

When Bob, wide-eyed and confused, glanced over his shoulder at Lydia, he saw that Tyce was standing alone in the middle of the floor, listening to the sounds from without and gnawing at his beard as though he would eat it up. Amid his own turmoil Bob was subconsciously aware that an extraordinary excitement possessed the lawyer. When the boy's staring eyes met the eyes of the man there was an odd flame in them.

In barely three minutes the tumult quieted down. The men disappeared. All was still. And to three of those in the printing-office this sudden quiet and the disappearance of the men were as mystifying and vaguely full of terror as the tumult which had gone before. Lydia still clung to her father. Bob stared now into the street, now back into the shop. Tyce stood in the middle of the room, gnawing his beard, the hand at his side knotted into a fist.

A little later Bob saw Duffy and another man cutting across-lots back of the post-office. In a few minutes other men began to drift back into the street casually. In a very short time they knew what had happened.

"The crazy cowboy," a character who had appeared in town a week before, no one knew whence, and excited languid amusement by his antics and eccentricities, had gone into the butcher-shop and demanded a link of sausage. Good-natured little Hermann, in his thick German accent, suggested payment for other links. The other then said, "I am the king of kings," drew a six-shooter and fired twice.

When the men arrived the little butcher lay dead in his own shop. His wife was shrieking over him. The cowboy stood in the doorway with a smoking pistol in his hand.

The dead body and the wailing wife settled it very promptly. The cowboy was taken to the livery stable and hanged.

A horror descended upon Cresset—fresh from peaceful Marmion, Ohio—out of the fine, free, blue sky. He could scarcely believe it. Why, the man was clearly insane! Everybody in town knew he was crazy!

But there was another point of view. "Crazy!" said Duffy. "Well, suppose he was crazy! Little Hermann's just as dead, ain't he? Being crazy don't help the widow and orphans. We won't have things of that kind going on here."

"That's what I say," said Trimble. "We've got to make this here a law-abiding community, crazy or no crazy."

Tyce spoke casually to the editor about it. "Things of that kind happen in a new country and a new town, more or less incidentally. I've been in a good many new towns in the West. The sense of an organized society doesn't penetrate them until they get older. Their fundamental feeling is all right. They hate murder so much and are so determined to discourage it, and they have so intimate a sense that they are the government, that the simple expedient of lynching the murderer comes into play almost of itself. I wouldn't take it too seriously. It's hard to run against the united sentiment of the community in which you live."

"THAT WILL DO," HE SAID IN A DECISIVE WAY

Bob Terhune heard Tyce say that, and judged him. It had come to the boy before that this man of new towns had known perfectly what was going on; that when he stood in the printing-office gnawing the point of his beard he knew that somebody had been shot and somebody else was going to be lynched; but he would not go out and try to interfere. Bob was still very miserable—acutely aware that he was only a clumsy boy who could give no better account of himself in the world than that he was trying laboriously to learn the printer's trade. Miss Lydia didn't care for him. He couldn't make a speech, he couldn't step out and command the attention of men and be the hero of a public occasion. It was natural that Miss Lydia should overlook him and turn with admiration to the mature, accomplished, commanding Tyce. But this man of whom she made her hero was not heroic at all. Bob was modest, but his mind lifted with the great thought that for Lydia's sake he would not have failed. He took a certain jealous comfort in this, although he looked at Miss Lydia's fluffy back hair more sadly than ever.

Then he overheard Mr. Cresset declare to her, "Tyce is a man of no moral principle!" And his heart quaked with hope.

He overheard this because the door in the back of the shop was open that morning when he was sweeping out. The shed which held the printing-office was divided in two parts—the office in front and two unceiled, unplastered bedrooms with a tiny hall between in the rear. Mr. Cresset and his daughter lodged there, taking their meals in the hotel.

Bob did not know what the debate between father and daughter was about; but he perceived that something had come over the little editor. Cresset was less alive to the all-important "locals"; he had an air of constrained excitement, and he sat at his bare pine table by the hour, writing, with frequent references to the Bible and Manual of American History, which contained the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution. He wrote, erased, tore up the sheet and wrote it over, wearing his pencil down to the middle and burning the midnight oil. Miss Lydia herself set the copy, but Bob saw some of the proofs, and he gathered that the Eagle was going to take high ground; that its leading article was to be a reprobation of lynching and a sharp spur to the torpid moral sense of the community.

As Cresset wrote and re-wrote and consulted his reference books he grew stronger in the faith. He told Lydia, with a tremor of excitement and a blush for the boast, that he believed it was going to be a trumpet-blast.

Cresset's article occupied three double-leaded, ill-printed and misspelled columns on the front page of the Eagle. In the height of his fervor he wound up:

> It would be better, not only for Blue Ridge, for Blue County, for Western Nebraska and for the United States of America, but for these misguided individuals themselves, if the district attorney took due cognizance of their crime and prosecuted them to the full extent of the law therefor. If thine eye offend thee, pluck it out.

No trumpet-blast could have created a greater sensation in Blue Ridge. It is one thing to hang a man in an excess of righteous indignation and quite another to be loudly called upon to face formal prosecution for the inadvertence. Cresset was shunned on the street with cold looks the day after the Eagle appeared. He received grim scrawls from Mr. Trimble and Mr. Hensen ordering their advertisements taken out and their subscriptions discontinued. On Saturday, when the weekly traders drove in—many of whom had assisted in upholding law and order at the livery-stable the week before—an atmosphere of trouble pervaded the town.

In the afternoon Hensen's Swede boy met Bob Terhune on the sidewalk before the post-office.

"I tank better you not stay by d' print-office to-night," said the Swede boy, and put his tongue in his cheek with an insulting wink.

Lafe's place was doing a rushing business.

Mr. Cresset and Miss Lydia kept off the street. They did not go to the Blue Ridge House for supper, but nervously ate some sandwiches in the back part of the shanty. The printing-office was closed at three o'clock, and when the sun went down all was dark there, both in the office and in the two living-rooms at the rear. Bob sat behind the press, thinking. "He was mean; he did not risk himself for her before."

It was half-past ten when they lifted the latch of the front door and softly pressed against the lock. The bolt was shot, but in a moment the impact of three shoulders shattered the frail pine barrier, and they poured in, Duffy holding up a lantern. The ample light from the lantern disclosed the meagre printing outfit. Duffy put the lantern on the table and upset the printer's "case." Then they saw Bob Terhune, a great, lank, overgrown pup of a boy, in his inky apron, standing against the inner door, a stove poker in his bony, awkward hands and a flame in his blue eyes.

"You don't come in here!" he sang out.

Inanimate things—such as a poor little hand-press, a printer's case and a pine table—are unsatisfactory objects for regulatory wrath. So there was a rush forward for the flesh and blood.

Within a minute and a half one regulator was lopping uncertainly over the press, seeing stars in his daze; another was nursing a broken arm; a third was spitting out his teeth with blood and profanity; Bob Terhune lay on the floor, crimson billows reeling across his vision; and Duffy was holding by the barrel the Colt's revolver, the butt of which had just collided twice with Bob's skull.

Duffy was about to bring the butt of the revolver in action again, and Jim Johnson's hired man was in the act of stepping forward with a heavy boot heel uplifted, when James E. Tyce, Esquire, shouldered a way through the room.

Tyce was prompt. He bestrode Bob's prostrate body. There was a revolver in his hand.

"That will do," he said in a decisive way.

There was the air of an expert about the seedy lawyer; something which suggested the man who had been there before, who knew what to do and was capable of doing it.

OUR AMERICAN SNOBS

In Which Mrs. Foxglove Secures a Beat for the Planet and Learns the True Inwardness of Her Nickel-Plush Friends

By JAMES L. FORD

FOR three months Mrs. Foxglove labored diligently and cheerfully as a member of the Planet's staff on a salary that left her a surplus for the payment of her debts—and let it be said that that was her first care—and the purchase of new clothes and many other articles for herself and her daughter.

Meantime, her face grew brighter, her form rounder and her step more springy, so that I comforted myself with the thought that the connection had proved of distinct benefit to her, although not in the way that I had intended. Indeed, so far from opening her eyes to the hollowness of the gods that she had been worshiping, her work as a fashion writer seemed only to draw her into closer affiliation with those members of the Nickel-Plush aristocracy whom she was called upon to exploit. Too well-bred to speak of her important friends in the presence of the vulgarians at Mrs. Catnip's table, she nevertheless told me that they had all been wonderfully kind to her, and none more so than the same Mrs. Fen Bertram who but a short time before had invited her out for a drive and then permitted her to walk home by herself in the rain.

"You've no idea how nice Mrs. 'Fen' has been to me," she cried artlessly. "She even insisted upon my bringing little Alice up to call on her, and she liked the child so much that she actually got up a little theatre party for her and invited some of the very nicest young people to meet her. Besides that, she had a photograph taken expressly for me, and when she found how much I liked it she said that although she never allowed her picture to appear in the newspapers she would let me use it in the Planet if it would do me any good. Of course I couldn't think of imposing on her in this way, so I just had it framed to hang up over my looking-glass. She even spoke to me two or three times about it and seemed annoyed that I didn't take advantage of her offer. That shows you what a good heart that woman has, even if she is fashionable."

It was not long after this that the old look of sadness and anxiety that I had come to know so well returned to the face of the little Southern widow. Her eyes began to lose their brightness, her step became heavy and tired. I learned that she was getting into debt again, and then Charley Bland told me, in reply to a confidential inquiry, that Mrs. Foxglove had proved something of a disappointment, owing to her unwillingness or inability to secure for the Sunday Planet society stories of the sort that were wanted. She had been dropped from the salary list and put on space, with a view to stimulating her to her very best efforts, or, as Mr. Bland gracefully put it, in order to "starve some good stories out of her." All this was, of course, very painful news to me.

Then there came the momentous day when young Kimball Shorthorn, a particular friend of Mrs. Fen Bertram's, made up his mind to open his Smart Set Delicatessen Shop, and Mrs. Catnip's boarding-house was shaken to its foundations at the tidings, as conveyed in the two columns of Planet space consumed by Mrs. Foxglove in chronicling that important event.

"Here's a pretty how-de-do!" cried Mrs. Taffeta; "I'd like to know what Mrs. 'Fen' Bertram will have to say, now that Kim's goin' to sell cheese across the counter. Mebbe she'll give him an order for to serve her with all her eggs an' butter. I'll bet Mrs. Vanastorbilt and her boy Joey'll feel pretty sick when they read their paper this mornin'. I'd give a farm to hev her come along an' see him with a white apron on to him, a-carryin' out a peck o' sweet potatoes to put into the grocery cart." (Mrs. Taffeta can be terribly sarcastic when occasion demands it.)

"My!" exclaimed Mrs. Grinders, as usual agape with wonder, "you don't mean that he'll actually wear a long white apron and wait on the Four Hundred folks the same as if he was a clerk in a corner grocery?"

"I dunno," retorted the sardonic Mrs. Taffeta. "If he does, 'twon't be the first time there's been a white apron wore in his family."

"Well, I'm goin' right up there the first day he opens, jest so I can say I've bought something across the counter from a member of the Four Hundred," said the admirable and intelligent Mrs. Grinders with much eagerness; and I saw at once that young Shorthorn was in a fair way to build up a profitable and subservient trade.

Mrs. Taffeta was right in her statement about the white apron, for it was Kimball's father who laid the foundations of the great fortune that his widow and daughters dissipated in such a short time after his death. He began life as a butcher, and sold meat in a white apron until his business became so large that he relegated that part of it to his subordinates and devoted himself to his wholesale interests. He remained in "trade," however, until the very last, and I have always understood that he enjoyed the respect of his business associates for his probity, sober sense and other homely virtues. If he could have been told that the press of his native country—that tireless engine of benevolence, humanity and progress—was destined to become hysterical over the fact that the youngest and, as he always supposed, the most foolish of his sons, had opened a delicatessen store, he would have gone to his death with the firm belief that he was better out of a world that was most assuredly running mad.

Yes, Kimball Shorthorn was going into trade and our boarding-house was convulsed over that important circumstance. As to the members of the Four Hundred, Mrs. Foxglove declared, of course at the usual column rate, that they were "agog" over the young man's proposed enterprise, and that in the boxes at the opera, at the dinner-tables of the wealthy and great and in the boudoirs of the fairest and most charming women, it was the sole topic of conversation.

"Just think!" said Mrs. Foxglove when we met in the drawing-room; "it was I that caused all that excitement downstairs, with my special story about young Shorthorn. I do wish you'd read it over carefully and let me know what you think of it," she continued wistfully; "I haven't been very fortunate in the office lately and I was hoping that this exclusive story that I got for them would make them think rather better of me."

"I've just finished reading it," I replied, "for I knew it was yours and I was curious to see how you were getting on. You have certainly made great progress."

"You really think so!" she exclaimed delightedly. "Then there is some chance of my learning to write well, after all!"

"I didn't say anything about writing well, but that is unquestionably an excellent lying story of the kind that the Sunday Planet is always looking for. You've got about as much untruth crowded into that two columns——"

"Why, he is going to open a shop. The lease was signed yesterday. It isn't untrue at all."

"My dear Mrs. Foxglove," I said soothingly, for she had flared up according to her not uncommon habit, "it may be true that the young donkey is going to sell sausage and pickles, but of what consequence is that in comparison with the mendacity that pervades every other line that you've written? Now, please listen to me without getting excited. You say that the members of the Four Hundred are agog over the news and that New York society is shaken to its foundations. Have you seen or heard of any one who has betrayed the slightest emotion at the tidings except that silly Grinders woman? And she takes leave of her few wits every time there's a wedding in Grace Church. You say, moreover, that the question asked everywhere is 'What will the Vanastorbilts say?' Did you ever hear any one ask such an idiotic question as that? If you did, the right answer is that the Vanastorbilts won't say anything at all. Then you convey the idea that the best society in New York looks with contempt upon any man who is in trade, whereas you know perfectly well that there is scarcely a family of any position whatever in this country that does not owe its wealth to trade. Can you name a single multi-millionaire who is not or has not been directly interested in some great commercial undertaking? One is in the oil trade; another carries freight and passengers about the country for a scheduled rate of compensation; a third makes shrewd real estate investments and has mastered the trade of building and renting houses and doing as little as possible in the way of repairs, while a fourth owes his fortune to the trade of politics which he has made remunerative. I can assure you that if a guest at the gold-laden table of the Vanastorbilts were to speak of commerce and those who follow it in the same contemptuous, sneering tone that you assume in the Sunday Planet, he would not be asked to stretch his legs under that mahogany again because of the grievousness of his offense."

"Well, that's the way they wanted it written and I had to do it," she said apologetically, and then added: "You see, the idea in the society page is to follow the English model and to assume that our society is like that of England——"

"And so, of course, your society column takes its style from the servants' hall just as the imitation Englishman takes his from those unspeakable cads who are permitted to sow the seeds of vulgarity in our clubs and drawing-rooms on the strength of some vague rumor, usually set afloat by themselves, that they are 'well connected'! How much prejudice against trade do you imagine exists among noblemen who are almost entirely given over to money-making, even to the extent of selling the game shot by their own guests? I can tell you that there is more of this sort of prejudice in the Duchess' novels than in the House of Lords. As for caste, it is making its last stand in the servants' halls, where the valet of the city magnate—no matter what his master's wealth—cuts a very poor figure indeed in comparison with the Duke's own gentleman and her ladyship's confidential maid. However, you have written an excellent Planet story and one that will certainly advance you materially in the esteem of Mr. Barshfield and his chief lieutenants."

"I'm sure I hope it will," she replied sadly, and then added with a deep sigh, "somehow everything that I do nowadays seems to turn out badly. Here I'm in a peck of trouble about Alice. I told you how nice Mrs. Bertram had been to her and how she'd introduced her to a number of her daughter's little friends? Well, just because she fancied that they were not nice to her she has refused to go to see them any more. That's the result of trying to have her grow up with a nice set of young people of the very best social position, who will be useful to her in after life. I hope to see Alice married before I die and in a few years these boys will be old enough to beau her round."

"Good Heavens!" I broke out, "you've already told me of the treatment your daughter has received at the hands of mere boys of twelve and fifteen at the Nickel-Plush Dancing Academy! Don't you know that fully ninety per cent. of the young men whom you look upon as such desirable associates for your daughter are simply those same dancing-school boys grown to a sort of premature manhood and raised to the nth power of snobbishness, heartless selfishness and complete worthlessness?"

"I don't see why you say such dreadful things of young men just because they're in society," whimpered Mrs. Foxglove.

"I don't say dreadful things because these young men are in society, but because I'm speaking the truth, and if you don't believe me, you have only to ask any one who really knows the town whether there is to be found on the surface of the earth a more thoroughly undesirable swarm of young men than those who make up the Park Row garbage heap known as 'among those present.' In my very young days, when New York's leisure class was much smaller than it is now and dancing men of presentable appearance far scarcer, there was a sexton named Brown who supplied society with all sorts of useful commodities, including male guests. These latter, who were known as 'Brown's young men,' were a band of agile youths who were willing to dance for hours at a stretch and with abundant vigor and grace, no matter what partners were selected for them. For their services they claimed no reward save the supper—they were famous trenchermen, these young men of Brown's—and the pleasure of being 'in society.' Few of them were to the manner born—if it be anything to be born to the manner of those who look to a sexton for their guests—but Brown was responsible for them and seldom indeed did one hear of misbehavior on the part of his brigade of dancing young men. Most of them followed humble callings when not engaged in their professionally social duties, toiling cheerfully in the marts of the retail trade by day and chasing the flying hours of night with nimble feet. They were infinitely superior in character, infinitely more desirable as husbands than the swarm of cheap dudes who go to make up the 'also-rans' of Nickel-Plush society. These bear about the same relation to the old Brown's brigade that the poorest class of uncared-for free negroes do to the well-kept, well-treated slaves that could have been found on scores of Kentucky and Virginia farms in the ante-bellum days."

Two days later I was suddenly called away to a distant part of the country, and for six weeks heard nothing of Mrs. Foxglove and did not see even a single copy of the Planet. During this time I began no less than four letters to the young widow, but tore each one of them up because I found it impossible, owing to certain new and indefinable feelings, to express myself satisfactorily. On my return to New York my first inquiry was of Mrs. Foxglove.

"She's not with us any more," said Mrs. Catnip, and I knew at once that something had gone wrong.

"Not here any more!" I exclaimed. "Why, what's the matter? I do hope nothing serious has happened," and I followed Mrs. Catnip into her own little sitting-room and closed the door behind me. And thus encouraged, my excellent landlady told me of what had happened during my absence.

"Of course," said Mrs. Catnip, who is a plain-spoken woman of great common-sense, "you only meant what was right when you got her that job on the Planet, and Heaven knows the poor thing needed a regular income about that time, for she was way in debt to me, to say nothing of owing money to dressmakers and shoemakers and what not for her clothes and Alice's, and right on top of it all she must send the child to that highfalutin Nickel-Plush Dancin' Academy, where the poor little thing was that set upon that her life was made miserable, and her mother had to take her out when all the lessons were paid for in advance.

"Well, as I was sayin', you meant only right by her when you got her that job, and for a time she certainly did well there an' made good wages an' got 'em regular. An' this I will say for her, if I was took out o' the world to-morrow, that whatever she got of a Monday, which is the regular pay day there, she brought straight to me till every penny she owed me was settled. Oh, she's an honorable woman as ever was, an' that's the reason I didn't want her to go away. 'Mrs. Foxglove,' says I, 'just stay with me till you get on your feet again an' then when you have money comin' in regular you can settle up the back account.' But no, she said she'd go to a cheaper place rather than owe money to me again."

"But did she lose her position on the Planet?" I exclaimed.

"Yes, sir, she lost it a couple of weeks after you left, and it come about in this way: You know the Planet's great for publishing all sorts of society scandals and they kind o' looked to her—knowing that she was associating with the gilt-edged set—to get hold of anything that was happening and fetch it down to the office. Meantime she'd been took up by that Mrs. Bertram and that Codliver critter that Mrs. Taffeta and Mrs. Grinders is always talkin' about, an' she got the idea into her head that the photographs they give her an' the stories they told her about this one an' that were just for her own private benefit and not to be put in the paper. I knew better, of course, but I couldn't make her see it. 'For the land's sake,' I said to her a dozen times over, right here in this room where we're a-settin' now, 'for the land's sake,' says I, 'what do you suppose they tell you those stories for except to print in the paper? Do they give you photographs that cost five dollars apiece just to put on your dressing-table?' But 'twa'n't no use talkin' to her. She wouldn't have it. So things went on till finally she come in here one night looking fearful worried an' told me they'd sent her up to find out what she could about the trouble between that Grimshawe and his wife, an' it seems she'd known all about it for a week. She got it straight from Mrs. Bertram, who come down here post haste in her carriage one afternoon an' took her out to drive, an' I knew when I see her settin' outside waitin' for her that she had some kind of an ax to grind. A woman with as hard a face as that Bertram woman has got don't go round askin' poor little widows out to drive unless she can make something out of them. Anyway, as soon as she got her in the carriage she commenced an' told her the whole story from beginnin' to end, an' how Mrs. Codliver's brother Tom was into it in some way an' had had to go way off to South America so's not to have papers served on to him. 'Well,' says I, when she'd finished tellin' about it, 'that woman told you that story because she wanted it printed, an' the best thing you can do is to go right down there an' tell 'em everything you know. It's the Planet folks that pays you your wages, an' it's precious little you'd get out of the Codlivers or Mrs. Bertram or any of the rest of those high flyers if you was to lose your position.' Oh, she couldn't believe that Mrs. Bertram ever thought of such a thing as havin' the story put into the papers when she told it to her. Anyway, she thought more of her friendship an' of trainin' with her than she did of her job on the newspaper.

"The next day the Megaphone come out with the whole thing printed an' the Lord knows how many pictures of everybody that there was into it. You'll hear about it when you come to the dinner-table to-night, for Mrs. Grinders ain't got done talkin' about it yet, though it's nigh on to a month ago. Well, there was a pretty how-to-do down in the office when they found the Megaphone had got the article, and the worst of it was that it came through Mrs. Bertram herself, and she had the impudence to say afterward that she gave it to Mrs. Foxglove first only she didn't seem to have enough pull to get it into the Planet. You'd better believe that Planet editor was mad clean through, an' he up an' fired Mrs. Foxglove as quick as 'scat.

"Up she goes to Mrs. Bertram, an' what do you think she says to her? She tells her right out that she was a fool not to use the story when she had it, an' asks her why it was she never printed her photograph in the society page when she took the trouble to go an' get one made especially for her? Then Mrs. Foxglove told her she'd lost her job an' she's never set eyes on her since. She's called on her two or three times an' written to her, but she hain't never answered and she's always 'out.' Mrs. Codliver's the same way, an' the dressmaker they introduced her to an' that she thought was givin' her clothes for nothin' is hollerin' for her money. There's your Four Hundred, an' thank God there's no more of 'em!"

"And where is Mrs. Foxglove now?" I asked.

"Here's her address," said Mrs. Catnip, "though mebbe I oughtn't to give it, for she told me she didn't want anybody to know where she was."

"Not even her most intimate friends?" I inquired searchingly.

"No; not even the tall Southern party. She had a fallin' out with him right after you left. He's a business man, you know, and as fine a gentleman as ever come into this house, an' she wrote an article—a foolish sort of a thing it was, too—sayin' as how folks that were in trade was looked down upon by the Four Hundred, an' when he read it he got awful mad—mebbe he thought it was a hit at him, though she never intended it that way. However, they had some words, an' when he went away he slammed the door so's the whole house shook. An' when she come out of her room two hours afterward her eyes were red and her cheeks pale. He come here once lookin' for her address, but I was out an' the servant couldn't give it to him. I hope he'll find her, though, an' it's my bounden duty to tell you, sir, that one of you two gentlemen ought to step up and talk turkey to that poor little widow after all the attentions you've been payin' her—the both of you—for that Southern party's just as much to blame as you. She's as fine a little lady as ever I knew—a fact that you're well aware of, as all the boarders can testify—and she'll make a grand wife for either one of you. That's right! Get up an' run the minute there's anything said about doin' your duty by yourself an' the human race! I declare, if that ain't just like a man."

I reached my room in a dazed condition, dropped into a chair and tried to wonder why it was that Mrs. Catnip's words had stirred me so deeply.

Just at dusk that evening I set forth from Mrs. Catnip's, a not unattractive figure, I flatter myself, clad in evening dress, with a light overcoat on my arm and a crush hat set at rather a rakish angle on my head. As I walked slowly down the rather shabby street in which Mrs. Foxglove lived, I heard more than one exclamation of surprise from the clusters of boarders who were enjoying the mild summer air on the front stoops. I had not gone far before I saw the familiar figure of the tall Southerner cross the street about a hundred feet in front of me and walk quickly up the boarder-encumbered steps of the house toward which I was rather diffidently making my way. For a single moment I paused and with trembling hands sought the support of the iron fence rail. With a supreme effort I marched on, looking neither to the right nor to the left until I reached the boarding-house in which the Southern widow lived. Then I turned my face and saw Loudon Buchanan sitting at the open window of the front drawing-room fanning himself with his Panama hat and waiting, just as I had seen him waiting on the principal sofa in Mrs. Catnip's front parlor.

The Watermelon-Way

By Frank L. Stanton

I bet you, I bet you, I'll be Comin' ter de scratch
W'en I sees de melon peepin'
  Thoo' de fence rail, in de patch!
  W'en he gettin' fat en roun'
  En des kiverin' de groun'.
En you thump him, en he answer
  Dat he red, en ripe, en soun'!

Den you'll fin' me any day
  Whar de watermelon stay.
Fer dey ain't no way so pleasant
  Ez de watermelon-way!

Ter think dat all de springtime,
  W'en it chill ez chill kin be,
He been sleepin' dar en dreamin'
  All his juicy dreams fer me!
  Dat de Sun dar, overhead,
  Fin' de place he make his bed.
En streak his sides wid white and green,
  En turn his heart ter red!

Oh, you'll fin' me any day
  Whar de watermelon stay.
Ez happy ez a Hoppergrass
  A-hoppin' 'cross de hay!

En I'll hunt a cool fence co'ner—
  Whar dey dunno whar I at,
One-half er him dis side er me,
  En t'other half on dat!
  En no roses er de South,
  In de dew or in de drouth,
Will be sweet ez dat dar honey
  Des a-meltin' in my mouth!

Den will come de holiday
  I been longin' fer sence May,
Fer de sweetes' way ter travel
  Is de watermelon-way!

Promotion Pointers

By M. Martin Kallman

ANDREW CARNEGIE, J. T. Harahan, Harlow N. Higinbotham and other men of large affairs have put strong emphasis on this one thing: The young man who is afraid to know something and to do something outside his own special work or department stands a poor chance of winning promotion.

This is one of the soundest and most usable of all "pointers" offered by men of great achievement to those who are struggling for success.

Do I hear you exclaim:

"Oh, that's all right when you get up to a position of some little responsibility, but it won't work down among the five and eight dollar a week employees!"

Only a few months ago I was called professionally to serve an establishment doing an immense retail business of the department store order. When the shoe section was reached my attention was immediately attracted by the boyish face of the assistant superintendent.

"How did you come to pick so young a lad for this place?" I asked the manager of the establishment.

"Because he made us select him," was the reply. "He's only eighteen years old now and looks young for his age. When he came to us we gave him the position of door-boy. The place paid him only five dollars a week, but we told him something better might open up later if he made himself generally agreeable. He took the place cheerfully. Apparently there wasn't much chance for a display of business talent in tending a door through which hundreds of hurried patrons pass each day. But the boy was uniformly polite and attentive.

"One day he encountered a disgruntled customer who had brought back a pair of shoes. He was 'sore,' and wished to register his kick as soon as he entered the door. Naturally, the door-boy was the first employee he encountered and he told his woes to the lad. The boy was all attention, asked him questions, expressed regret for the mistake that had been made, and said: 'I'll get another boy to watch the door for a few minutes while I go with you to the shoe department and see that this matter is straightened out.' When they reached the shoe section the clerks were all busy. Perhaps they saw that the lad had a 'kicker' in tow. Anyhow, they were all engaged. But this didn't phase the boy. He went straight ahead and waited upon the man as effectively as if trained in the shoe business. The customer went away highly pleased and the boy returned to his work.

"I happened to miss the boy from the door, when he was upstairs, made inquiries and observations and learned just what he had done. That was enough for me; I knew that a boy who would go out of his way to do a thing of that kind and who could see it through as nicely as that boy did would make a good second man in the shoe department. And besides, I wanted to give the other employees an object-lesson of the principle that the one who isn't afraid to see a point and do a turn for the good of the house outside the narrow limits of his own particular job is bound to get pushed ahead."

CHAPTER IX.—(Concluded)

CRANE was perfectly silent. He did not speak a word from the time they left Senator Bicknell's house until they reached home. Annette said nothing to him. The conviction was deepening in her mind that her husband had secretly behaved ill to Senator Bicknell. Crane had revealed unconsciously that night many things which Senator Bicknell had not understood, but which Annette understood only too well. The slight agitation and discomposure which Crane had shown was not the mere shock of a grateful surprise. Annette detected that every word Crane had uttered to Senator Bicknell was false, that his apparent acceptance of the offer was false. The money was much, much to her; the loss of it, after it had been held up to her gaze, would be much; but the loss of Crane's integrity—ah, could that but be preserved she would go out and dig for him and for her children! She would slave, she would starve, she would do anything that any woman ever did that she might feel her children were the children of an honest man. She remembered there was such a thing as heredity, and she trembled at the thought that if Crane were really a scoundrel, as Senator Bicknell had said Governor Sanders was, her little black-eyed Roger might be a scoundrel, too, before he died. These thoughts, surging through her mind, kept her silent.

Crane felt her silence to be ominous as she felt his to be. As he sat dumb, by her side, his agitation increased instead of diminished. On what possible ground could he excuse to Annette, as well as to Senator Bicknell, his declination of such an offer? But he could not accept it—he was not yet a thorough villain. Had he been a free agent he would have preferred the splendid vista of power and preferment opened to him by his deal with Sanders to more money even than what was offered him—but he was not a free agent. He had promised Sanders, and if his nerve failed him he would be ruined by Sanders politically and perhaps personally as well. True, Sanders did not have a line of his writing—such agreements as theirs are not put on paper—nor had he, so far, borrowed a dollar from Sanders, although he expected to do so the first of the year, when his notes fell due.

While he was pondering these thoughts he found himself before the door of the great caravansary where they lived; and presently he was sitting in their little drawing-room, alone at last, and face to face with the strange circumstances which had befallen him. He sat in a great armchair, drawn up to the embers of the fire. On the table at his elbow a light was burning. He heard Annette go into the children's room and remain five minutes—she always said a little prayer above their cribs every night before she slept—then she went into her own room.

She turned on the light by her dressing-table and sat down to take off her few simple ornaments and the ribbon bow in her hair. The face that met her gaze in the mirror looked so strange that it frightened her. Yes, like Crane himself, she had been surprised at her own self-control, but she knew as well as she knew she was alive that Crane in some way had betrayed Senator Bicknell—the man who, after honestly admitting that Crane could serve him, was yet animated by a sincere wish to benefit Crane, and who had given him his first political start in life, and had treated him with unvarying kindness ever since.

The more she thought over what had happened that evening the more acute became her fear and her pain. She stopped in her employment, and leaning upon her arms sat motionless for a long time. Suddenly the distant chiming of a clock told her it was midnight. She roused herself and then, following an influence stronger than herself, went into the next room where Crane had been going through his agony alone. As she approached him he raised a pale and conscience-stricken face to hers, but it was quite calm. He had fought the battle out.

"Yes," he said, as if continuing aloud a consecutive train of thought, "I should be very grateful to you. I am grateful to you. No doubt Senator Bicknell was influenced very much in what he did by the admiration and respect he has for you. But it only makes it the harder for me."

"There should be no question of gratitude between you and me," replied Annette, coming closer to him.

"There is much—much. I have not realized until within the last few months how much I really owe you—but why do I say months? I might say the last few hours, the last few minutes; and I have also realized how much more I might have owed you, for I am beginning to think that few women are as well adapted as you are for the wife of a man like me. Not all women would have borne with poverty and seclusion as you have done."

A deep blush suffused Annette's face. The poverty and seclusion had been in a way forced upon her by him, but being a woman of invincible discretion she did not put her resentment into sarcastic words, or words at all. She stood by him silently, and seeing that Crane was striving to speak, awaited his words gently, laying her free hand on his shoulder.

At last it came—a full confession, made in broken words and phrases, but of which Annette understood every word.

"I could have stood anything but his kindness," said Crane with a pale face of woe. "That unnerved me completely. I made up my mind I could not accept the money—and then it occurred to me that you had a right to be consulted, and immediately I felt a conviction as loud as a clap of thunder, as penetrating as lightning, that you would never in the world let me accept that money. Ah, Annette, what a thing it is to have an upright wife! To feel that however weak and wavering a man may be, that half of his soul, of his heart, of his possessions, the half owner of his children, stands like a rock for truth and honesty! Thorndyke was saying something to me the other day about a man being upright instead of being made to be upright. I tell you, there are many men who can be made good or bad—and I am one of them—by their wives. Many a poor wretch to-day is a rascal who might have led an honest and respected life if only he had had a high-minded wife—like you. It is you who have saved me, and what a miserable return have I made you for all you have done for me!"

"What you have just said repays me for all, because you know I have always loved you—better than you cared to know, or than I cared to show during the last few years."

Crane rose and opened his arms to her. It was the sweetest moment of their lives. Shameful and dishonorable as Crane's course had been, here was one person who loved him, believed in him, and oh, wonder of love and faith! still honored and trusted him.

After their first rapture of love and forgiveness, action occurred to Annette's practical mind.

"Well, then," she said, as if a course of conduct had at once been revealed to her, "you must at once withdraw from your agreement with Governor Sanders. Of course, he will do everything he can to defeat you——"

"And he will."

"And we shall have to go back to Circleville and begin life over again, but I am sure you can do well at your profession—and remember, there is as much chance for an ambitious man in law as in politics."

"Yes—but you can't imagine how the life gets hold of one. It seems like death to me to leave Congress—and when I was steadily rising, too—and to be driven out ignominiously by a creature like Sanders! But I must do it—you would not let me do otherwise."

"Yes, I would not let you do otherwise. Then you must go to Senator Bicknell and tell him all."

"Do you think I should? Do you think I could?"

"Oh, yes. He must know it some time; he must know why you decline this scheme he has arranged to benefit you. You must go to him early to-morrow morning."

Crane looked at his watch.

"It is half-past twelve—he always sits up until two or three o'clock in the morning."

"Then go now."

"He will think my repentance a mere emotion; he will believe that my character was shown in my agreement with Sanders."

"No matter."

"Yes, no matter."

Annette gave him his coat and hat and gloves. He turned to kiss her, and instinctively he removed his hat with a respect that approached reverence. This pretty pebble which he had so lightly regarded had proved to be a jewel of great price.

Two hours later Crane reëntered the house and went softly to his own rooms. As he noiselessly opened the door of the drawing-room he saw that Annette had fallen asleep in the great chair in which she had found him. She had thrown a fur cape around her bare neck and arms, but it had slipped partly away, leaving her white throat exposed. There were traces of tears upon her cheeks, but her face, though mournful, was placid—and how young she looked! It seemed impossible that she should be the mother of two children as old as Roger and Elizabeth.

As Crane approached her quietly she stirred, opened her eyes and sat up, in full possession of her wits. Crane drew a chair up and took both her hands in his.

"I haven't felt so at ease in my mind since the day, last summer, that I first met Governor Sanders. I have repented and confessed."

"That is good," said Annette in a clear voice.

"I found Senator Bicknell just where I had left him in his den. I told him the whole story: how I had yielded, because I was poor and ambitious, where a better man would have resisted. I told him there was no fear of my falling away this time—that you would not let me—and if I had kept you with me and had taken you more into my confidence I believe I should never have entered into this damnable bargain with Sanders. The Senator was staggered at first. I don't believe the slightest idea of my being disloyal to him had entered his head, but as soon as he recovered from the first shock he behaved nobly. I told him that I had not written a line to Sanders, that he had not loaned me a penny—although I had expected to call upon him the first of January. Then Senator Bicknell said:

"'So you have not committed any overt act against me?'

"'No,' I said, 'but chiefly because the time was not ripe.'

"'You have, so far, only agreed to betray me?'

"I said yes—but that was crime enough. He reflected a while, and then he held out his hand and said:

"'Let bygones be bygones. Sanders will make you pay for this, and that will be punishment enough. But I am ready and willing to believe that, no matter how much you might have agreed to knife me, when the time came you wouldn't have done it. At the first moment we meet in private, at the first hint of kindness on my part, your resolution to do me wrong melts away. That must count.'

"'And something else,' I said. 'Of course, I can't accept the benefit you thought to confer on me. That would invalidate all.'

"'What does your wife say to this?' he said. 'You remember the offer was made in her presence. Or does she know that you wish to refuse it?'

"'My wife would not let me take it if I wished to,' I replied. 'She is a much more high-minded person than I am or ever can be.'

"'She must indeed be high-minded,' he said, 'and you are right in saying that to accept it would invalidate everything. I am of the opinion that your wife has seen clearly in this instance. But'—here he took a turn or two up and down the floor—'I don't think it would invalidate my promoting your candidacy before the Legislature in January. It seems to me now to be the best thing for both of us. The fight with Sanders has got to come—and the sooner the better, so that the field can be cleared for my own fight a year and a half from now. Yes, it is decidedly best. You may recall I indicated last spring that I should support your Senatorial aspirations in certain contingencies. These contingencies have come to pass. I doubt if we can save the State to the party without joining forces now.'

"Then I told him that I owed money, and could hardly support the position of a Senator here with the salary, less what I was obliged to pay in interest.

"'Nonsense,' he said; 'turn your salary over to your wife. She is a woman of uncommonly sound sense—a good manager—that I saw in her house. Of course you can't go into society on less than your salary, but you can live comfortably and respectably. And let me tell you, this town is full of big houses which caused the Senators who built them to lose their elections. It doesn't hurt a man with his constituents in the least to live simply. Some of the gentlemen from the rural districts have complained bitterly of this little place——'

"And then, after more talk, everything was settled. I wasn't to write to Sanders, of course, but to go and see him. Sanders wouldn't dare to proclaim what we agreed to do, but he will fight me with every weapon at his command. I shouldn't much care how things went—that is, so I feel now—except for Senator Bicknell, but every blow at Sanders helps the Senator, and I shall fight for him as long as breath warms my body. When we parted I was much overcome, and I think Senator Bicknell was, too. Coming home, it occurred to me how well you had managed on the pittance I allowed you at Circleville."

"It was not much, but it could hardly be called a pittance," replied Annette, smiling through her tears—for the stress of emotion under which she had suffered had found its natural vent at last and she was weeping a little. But they were happy tears; Crane had reached the turn in life when it was to be determined whether God or the devil should be his master, and he had turned his back on Satan. He took his wife in his arms and kissed her tenderly and reverently. No one knew better then than he the moral beauty, the power to charm, to sustain, to lead forward, of the woman he had not thought worthy to stand by him in Washington.

The next morning early Crane started West. He had his fateful interview with Sanders and returned within a week. Sanders' words had been few, but full of meaning.

"All right," he said. "I don't take any stock in this awakening of conscience business. You think Bicknell can serve you better than I can. Very well. We shall see."

Suddenly, and apparently without volition, Crane's right arm shot out, and his open palm struck Sanders' cheek. The Governor, as quick as thought, hit back. He was a brute, but not a coward. Then both men came to their senses, and hating each other worse than ever, each was ashamed of his violence.

The Governor was the first to speak.

"I don't care to engage in a fist fight with you. We can settle all our quarrels when the Legislature meets. You will need all your courage then."

When Crane returned to Washington he went straight to Senator Bicknell and told him all.

"All right," replied the Senator, as Governor Sanders had said, "this is my fight now." And straightway the Senator took train for the State capital to pull off his coat and do yeoman's work for Crane, and incidentally for himself.

The month of December was bright and beautiful all the way through and the sunshine lasted into January. Thorndyke thought he had not been so nearly happy for a long time. He saw Constance often, and she was beautifully kind to him. He scarcely went into society at all, and had the hardihood to decline an invitation to one of the Secretary of State's small dinners, on the comprehensive excuse of "a previous engagement," which Mrs. Hill-Smith, who had invited him, did not believe in the least; and when she had plaintively mentioned the names of various English, French, Russian, Austrian and German diplomats who were to be present, Thorndyke had replied in a manner which mightily discomposed Mrs. Hill-Smith:

"Oh, then, you won't miss a stray American or two!"

If Mrs. Hill-Smith had had her way she would have missed every American invited.

Thorndyke saw much of the Cranes and of the children, who showered their favor upon him. He could not but be struck by the new note in Crane—something subdued, yet full of hope—and he had quite lost that look of harassment and dejection which on first meeting him had struck Thorndyke. Crane was normally a lover of fighting, and although Senator Bicknell, for strategic reasons, chose to keep him in Washington while the preliminaries of the Senatorial fight were raging, yet he delivered some good shots at long range, and it began to look as if he might be elected for the short term in spite of Governor Sanders. The National Committee was not indifferent to this fight, and Senator Bicknell went into it with all his old-time vigor. He worked, ate and drank, waked and slept with members of the Legislature for three weeks before the election came off. It was a stupendous battle and neither side got any odds in the betting.

During the latter part of the Christmas recess Thorndyke went North to pay his sister Elizabeth a visit. Her first words to him were:

"Why, Geoffrey, how young you look!"

And everybody who met him told him he looked young, or looked well, or looked prosperous, and one horny-handed old constituent hazarded the opinion that Mr. Thorndyke was "thinkin' o' gittin' spliced." It was all because Constance Maitland had been kind to him.

The day of his return to Washington he was walking along the street in the bright, sunny, early afternoon of winter. He stopped to buy an evening newspaper, that he might see how the balloting for Senator was going in Crane's State, when a shout aroused him, and Letty Standiford, in a gorgeous crimson automobile, with Senator Mince Pie Mulligan by her side, dashed up to the sidewalk.

"Mr. Thorndyke," shrieked Letty playfully, pretending she meant to run Thorndyke down, "I have a piece of news for you—look out, this is my new red devil—I don't mean Senator Mulligan, but my auto."

"I certainly shall look out when you are around in that death-dealing machine," replied Thorndyke, dodging barely in time to save his legs. "What is your news?"

"Just this: Dad gave me his word this morning that he would not be a candidate for reelection next year. I went after the doctors myself and made them tell me the truth about Dad—he's the only father I've got, you know. And they all told me the same thing—that if he could slack up work and retire at the end of his term he was good for twenty years more, but that if he kept at the grind his life wasn't worth a pin's purchase. Dad wasn't scared by that; but when I told him that I should die of fright and distress if he went away and left me, the poor old thing weakened, and said he'd decline a reelection, and—oh, good gracious! He told me not to breathe it to a soul! He actually shook his finger at me when he said it. Oh, Heavens! If you or Senator Mulligan give me away——"

"Dad will shake his finger at you again," replied Thorndyke, laughing. Nevertheless, his pulses had started off at a great rate.

"It's not that—not that I'm afraid of him—but it would break his dear old heart to think I had disobeyed him."

Letty Standiford, as she said this, was an object for angels to love, in spite of her wild air, her mannish hat and coat, her flying and disheveled locks.

"It is safe with me," said Thorndyke gravely; and Senator Mulligan spoke up:

"Divil a word will I say about it—I'm too much afraid of th' ould chap—an' of you, too, Miss Letty."

"Glad to hear it, Sinitor," replied madcap Letty, viciously mimicking the Senator's unfortunate accent, "and oh, Mr. Thorndyke, have you heard that Miss Maitland is engaged to Mr. Cathcart, the navy man who is always hanging around her? It was announced this morning. Good-by."

Letty flashed off, with a bicycle policeman after her full tilt.

Thorndyke was near his lodgings. He did not know how he got there, but presently he found himself sitting in his armchair before the fire. Two hours later, when the maid-servant brought him a letter, he was sitting in the same position.

The dusk was closing in, but he saw that the address was in Constance Maitland's handwriting. Of course she had written to tell him of her engagement; it was kind of her so to break his calamity to him.

The letter lay unopened for half an hour. Then, with a desperate courage, Thorndyke tore open the envelope.

THORNDYKE'S AGONY INCREASED WITH EVERY WORD

It was an invitation to dinner two weeks hence.

It was unfeeling of her to do this—it was ignoble to forget that dear lost past of which she had often spoken to him and had allowed him freely to speak to her. It was impossible that he should accept, it was impossible that he should voluntarily meet Constance again—except for one last interview—that final leave-taking which is like the last farewell to the dying. And the sooner it was over the better. Thorndyke pulled himself together and made up his mind to go to Constance at once.

As he walked along the streets in the sharp air of the January twilight everything looked unfamiliar to him. His interior world was destroyed—engulfed. Never more could he know hope or happiness. For him was only that stoical endurance of life which is like a prisoner's endurance of his cell and his shackles. When he reached Constance Maitland's door she was at home and he walked into the familiar drawing-room. She was sitting on the great, deep sofa with no light but that of the blazing wood fire, although it was quite six o'clock. She rose as Thorndyke entered, and greeted him gayly. Her meditations seemed to have been singularly happy.

Thorndyke sat down on the sofa by her, and as all men do under stress of feeling, put his pain into the fewest words possible.

"I heard this afternoon," he said in a strange, cold voice, "of your engagement to Cathcart."

"Did you?" replied Constance, smiling brightly. "From whom, pray?"

"From Miss Standiford."

"So that crazy Letty Standiford goes about announcing my engagement!" There was a pause, and then Thorndyke said, in the same strange, cold voice:

"Cathcart is an admirable man."

"So everybody says," brightly responded Constance. "Many persons have assured me of that."

A longer pause followed. It might be ungenerous to interject a note of pain into her first happiness, but it is human to cry out, to justify one's self, to call attention to the gift, when one has given a heart and a soul.

"If Cathcart can give you even a part of the fortune you will lose by marrying him, he is right to ask you. I could give you nothing—and so, although I have loved you for nineteen years, I could not ask you to descend from wealth to poverty with me."

"I sha'n't lose, perhaps, as much as you think by marrying an American," replied Constance to this, adjusting her draperies in the light of the fire, which played over her face. How bright, how smiling she was! Her dark eyes shone, and the faint dimple in her cheek kept coming and going. "I did not, of course, relish the thought of spending all my life alone," she continued, laughing shamelessly. "I was very young, you may remember. So I determined to save up all I could of my income. It was easy enough, living as I did, with a person who was most of the time a helpless invalid. Then, my uncle, von Hesselt, realizing the injustice done me by my aunt, left in his will a considerable sum of money, which was to be paid me if I lost my aunt's fortune through marrying an American. This was no more than fair, as my aunt left the money to the von Hesselts in case I should marry an American. My lawyers here have assured me that it is an open question whether I could not, after all, marry whom I will and retain the money, because the terms of the reversion to the von Hesselts are very obscure, and it might come at last to my aunt's heirs-at-law, of which I am the chief. But I hate publicity and lawsuits and all such things, and as I am still reasonably well off I concluded to spare myself such agonies and to be satisfied with much less than I have now. But it will be enough to give me all I want in any event. I can keep this house, my carriage and servants, and dress and travel as I have been accustomed. What more does any one want?"

As she continued speaking Thorndyke's agony increased with every word. If only he had known before! Possibly—ah, how vain now was it! How hopeless, how full of everlasting pain.

"But," Constance kept on, "Mr. Cathcart is not the man for whom I should sacrifice even so much. He has never hinted that I should marry him. I am sure he doesn't want me—I can't imagine how such an absurd report got out."

Thorndyke felt stunned. He said, after a moment:

"So you're not engaged to Cathcart?"

"Certainly not. Haven't I just said that he has never asked me to marry him? and that he is not the man for whom I would sacrifice any part of my fortune?"

She emphasized the "he" and her words were full of meaning.

Poor Thorndyke was so dazed, so overwhelmed, that he could do nothing but stare stupidly into Constance's face. The man who really loves and suffers is generally stupid at the supreme moment. And as she looked into his eyes, so full of longing, and yet, half-despairing, she turned her head aside and held out her hand a little way—and he caught it in his.

Ten minutes afterward Scipio Africanus poked his head in the door and saw that which made his eyeballs bulge an inch from his head. At the same moment the bell rang sharply.

Poor Richard Junior's Philosophy

¶ The best excuse is a poor excuse.

¶ True love is never chilled by ice cream.

¶ In life our enemies are often our best friends.

¶ Betting is a practice which no wise man ever preached.

¶ What the pocket wins in politics the character loses.

¶ Keep on going ahead; let others look for footprints.

¶ The man who never owed anything never owned much.

¶ Nature allows long credit but charges compound interest.

¶ As a maid she bends the man; as a wife she keeps him straight.

¶ Some men are born foolish and some preserve their old love-letters.

¶ A man who gives way to his moods is weak on all the ten commandments.

¶ It is hard to reform the boy who got whipped in his youth for telling the truth.

¶ In art the primary colors are red, blue and yellow; in politics, black and blue.

¶ Whistling to keep the courage up is all right, but the whistle should not be wet.

¶ Every man is the architect of his own destiny, but the trouble is we don't pay enough attention to the fire-escapes.

¶ Doctor Parkhurst advises young men to be near the track when the train of opportunity passes. Better be at the station where it stops.

The Amusement Microbe

IT IS a normal function of childhood to be self-amusing. Your little daughter who calls her doll Cinderella and sees in the glowing embers of the log fire the coach-and-four and shivers with pure joy at the postman's knock, believing it the coming of the Prince with the tiny slipper, owes less of her happiness to you who read the story to her than to her imagination that realized it. Your boy, stealthily and laboriously crawling through the long grass upon the unsuspecting redskin whom he intends to bring low with one swift, silent thrust of his faithful bowie, owes but a small debt to Cooper. The source of amusement, which is an important ingredient of happiness, is within them.

There are flowers that thrive without care, and some children of a larger growth have managed to keep on good terms with their own thoughts. But with many the function of self-amusement is laid away with the other outgrown toys of childhood. "Amuse me" is the interpretation of the ill-concealed yawn of the badly-educated society belle. "Bored to death" is the wearied cry of the unemployed rich, fast learning the limitations of the purchasing power of money. Envy, hatred, malice and all uncharitableness are the spawn of this lust for amusement. Few sights there are that excite the risibles of the Olympians more than that of the man who has toiled the best of his days to amass wealth and has neglected the education that enables him to enjoy it. It is in the chase that the sport of the game is to be found. The quarry once run to earth—what remains? Surely one can't be expected to play with the brush all one's life.

The Kingdom is within you! You have neglected to cultivate the acquaintance of a valuable friend if you have not trained your power of self-amusement. If your parents were wise in stimulating this faculty, get down on your knees and thank them for a priceless heritage. To you, then, leisure is a brief moment of pure joy, not to be treated lightly or in frivolous spirit. It is to be treasured and hugged close to the breast as a darling child. It is to be shared even grudgingly with friends; and those few and choice. A good book, music, the song of birds, the voice of Nature—these are its companions.

If you cannot leave to your children wealth—and there are worse fates—see that the normal function of self-amusement with which their Creator has endowed them is cultivated, and you will add untold joy to their manhood and declining old age.

The Detective with a Million Arms

A DIAMOND necklace that cost many tens of thousands was stolen from a New York residence not long ago. As soon as the detectives arrived they said: "Say nothing of this to the reporters. Don't let anybody hear of it. If it gets out we can do nothing." After they had worked for several weeks without accomplishing anything, the newspapers happened on the facts and published them. The same day a pawnbroker came forward with some of the jewels; the next day the thief was caught and the rest of the jewels were found. Why? Because with the newspaper publication the search for thief and plunder began to be made not by two or three thick-headed "sleuths" but by millions upon millions of human beings, each casting about in his own neighborhood for some clue to the mystery.

Several years ago Russia began to move into Manchuria. The "diplomats" of the other European Powers began to tunnel under Russia's tunnel. "Not a word of this must get out. The public makes a mess of everything. Just let us alone to burrow in the dark and Russia will soon be retreating." Finally the matter was uncovered accidentally. But it was too late. Russia, calmly disregarding the silly little mole tunnel of the diplomats, had got her long claws well planted, and though publicity has made it impossible for her to move as rapidly as she was doing, as long as the diplomats let her work in secret, diplomacy's blunderings cannot be set straight.

There are no exceptions to the rule that honesty and honest purposes of every kind seek the light and thrive best in it, while skull-digging is never better pleased than when it can induce honest men to say: "Yes, publicity is a dangerous thing. Let's fumble about in the dark."

The President's Finishing Course

NO PRESIDENT of the United States is fully qualified for his work until he has crossed the continent. President Roosevelt has just completed this part of his education. By his life on the Western plains and in the Rocky Mountains he had gained a broader national outlook than had been possessed by most of the occupants of his office; but still he has recognized the need of a Pacific finishing course, and in his first speech in California he frankly expressed the pleasure he felt in finally securing it.

When the President entered the garden of Southern California he had traveled as far as from London to Teheran. Had he made a similar journey in Europe and Asia he would have crossed the frontiers between not less than eight nations and languages, and might easily have crossed many more. But here he was always at home. "The thing that strikes me most," he said, "as I go through this country and meet the men and women of the country, is the essential unity of all Americans. Down at the bottom we are the same people all through."

There is nothing more inspiring than a tour of inspection among the continental outposts of the United States. Whether you go to Eastport or to San Diego, to Seattle or to Palm Beach, you find the tide of American life beating vigorously against its boundaries. If you stand by the monument, sixteen miles south of San Diego, where Mexico meets the United States, you are just as much at home, in just as thoroughly American an atmosphere, as if you were walking down Broad Street in Philadelphia. You are not in a province tied to a distant metropolis—you are in the metropolis itself, just as you are in England whether you land in Kent or in Lancashire.

It is the same in Alaska, which is a part of the actual United States, temporarily separated from the main body by a strip of foreign territory. It is this ubiquity of Americanism—the fact that the country is alive all through, to its very tips, and not merely in spots—that constitutes the real strength of this republic. It is this, and not our size, numbers or wealth, that makes us impregnable at home.

The Unreasonable Millions

WITH due allowance for the tendency to exaggerate present ills and minimize those of the past, it is a fact that the unrest of "labor" is greater now than it has ever been before in this country. There are two reasons for it.

Education, especially by one-cent newspapers, has made the class which appropriates to itself the name "labor" acutely conscious of the inequalities of wealth and of the benefits to be got with money—better food, better clothing, better shelter. Ostentation on the part of those who have profited enormously by the present prosperity has set "labor" to worrying. It has read of millions made by simply "reorganizing" an industry, of other millions made by merely standing ready to "finance" a "flotation," should financing be necessary—which it was not. It has heard promoters confess that they really couldn't tell what they had done with that trifling item of twenty millions or so of stocks and bonds issued to bring a capitalization up to a good round sum—but paying huge interest and dividends. It has seen presidents cavorting from casino to casino and younger sons tossing the lifetime wages of an artisan on the spin of a roulette wheel. And worried "labor" has said to itself, is saying to itself: "There seems to be a good bit of money going about. There seem to be a lot of people to whom money comes easy and in bales. Am I getting my share of the prosperity? If money now grows on bushes, what's the matter with a money-bush on the fire-escape landing outside my flat-windows?"

Unreasonable? But the human animal has never been strong in logic. And isn't there a thread of reason in this, after all? And doesn't it constitute a situation which will be more intense before it is less so? And shouldn't that situation be regarded calmly and temperately and fairly—especially by those who have had those opportunities to acquire self-control and ideals above money-grabbing which the mass of our "labor" has not had?

An International Picture Book

MOST people do not really know a thing until they see it. They may have it told to them in words, but the idea does not actually penetrate their brains until it gets in through the eyes. It is likely, therefore, that the publication in the new edition of the Statesman's Year Book of a series of comparative statistical diagrams will give to a good many people in Europe a new conception of the commercial and industrial position of the United States.

For instance, it is commonly believed abroad that we have practically no merchant marine. These diagrams make it apparent that our merchant marine is second to that of England, and almost equal to the shipping of all the other maritime powers combined. It has more than half the tonnage of that of Great Britain, and nearly three times that of Germany, which ranks next to us. It exceeds the aggregate tonnage of Germany, France, Italy and Japan. Its mere increase in the past twelve years has been greater than the total amount of shipping now sailing under the flag of any other country except England and Germany; its absolute increase has exceeded that of any other country except England, and its relative increase has exceeded England's. Of course, it is our coastwise and lake shipping that enables us to make this showing, but this is a legitimate part of our maritime resources.

The growth of our iron production is a more familiar phenomenon. Still it may give some foreigners a little shock to observe that while the American output of iron ore was multiplied by nearly four in the twenty years between 1880 and 1900, that of Great Britain fell off in the same period by about twenty-two per cent., and had a still further and heavy fall the following year. Great Britain was producing just fifty per cent. more iron in 1880 than in 1901. In 1900 the United States produced more than Great Britain, France and Austria-Hungary combined, nearly twice as much as Great Britain alone, and forty-five per cent. more than Germany.

The United States took first place in the production of coal in 1899 and has kept it ever since. We produce considerably more now than Great Britain.

These things have been known, of course, to all who have taken the trouble to keep track of statistics. But figures mean nothing to the man on the trolley car. What he wants is a picture that will hit him in the eye, and in these colored Year Book diagrams he gets just what he needs.

MEN and WOMEN

JUDGE HOLMAN, of Indiana, famous for years as the "Watchdog of the Treasury," was one of the picnickers from Washington who went to see the first battle of Bull Run fought. He drove down with many other members of Congress, firm in the idea that the Union soldiers would make short work of the Confederates, and, with the rest, was panic-stricken when the Confederates chased the Union soldiers back in confusion.

Years later he was telling of his experiences. "I was there," he said, "and pretty soon the soldiers and citizens who had gone to see the battle began to come by, running fit to kill. I watched them for a spell, and then I thought I'd better be getting along home."

"Did you run?" asked Judge Culberson.

"I hastened a bit," confessed Holman.

"Which way?"

"To tell the truth," said Holman, "I veered a trifle to the North."

The Nearsighted Senator

ONE of Washington's charming society matrons is locally celebrated for her extraordinary number of gowns.

Somebody showed Senator Spooner her picture a few days ago. She was in evening dress, with the bodice cut very low.

"This is the newest picture of Mrs. So-and-So," said the friend. "Do you know, she has a hundred and fifty gowns?"

"Is that so?" asked the Senator. "I wonder why she didn't wear one of them when she had this picture taken?"

The Eternal Question

THE National Council of Women was in session. A stormy debate was on. Some great question was under discussion. Delegates in all parts of the hall were talking excitedly. The noise was deafening.

Suddenly there was a lull. The debate ceased. Then there came clearly from the centre of the hall: "The dressmaker said it would take three yards and seven-eighths, but I managed to get it out of three and a quarter."

The speaker was Mrs. Helen Adelaide Shaw, daughter of Agassiz. She was talking to Mrs. Elizabeth B. Grannis, the social reformer of New York.

A Predigested Moral

WHEN Thomas W. Palmer returned to Detroit from Spain, where he had been United States Minister, he went to his office to see how things were going. The young man he had left in charge of his great interests took him out to luncheon.

They went to a club. The luncheon check was more than ten dollars. Next day Palmer dropped around about one o'clock and invited the manager to go to luncheon with him. He led the way to a "quick-lunch" place, took a stool and motioned his manager to another. The check was forty cents.

"You see," said Palmer as they came out, "I am only worth a million or so, and I can't afford to pay ten-dollar luncheon checks."

The manager said nothing, but he never forgot.

An Expensive Sample

COLONEL FRANCIS G. WARD, now Superintendent of Public Works at Buffalo, was for some years connected with the construction corps of the Panama Railroad.

"We had curious handicaps in the work," said Colonel Ward. "All of our material came from France. Once we needed some bolts. We sent a wooden model of the kind we wanted to France and ordered four million of them. The bolts came back, but they were all made of wood like the model—four million beautifully-made wooden bolts of no earthly use except for kindling."

A Touch of Genius

GEORGE W. HARVEY knows more about good things to eat than any man in Washington. His restaurant has long been famous with all the public men of the country.

Harvey went to Paris a few years ago and, naturally, met and talked with the gourmets there. Some of his friends, confident that no Frenchman knew the gentle art of eating and fixing things to eat so well as he, arranged a salad-dressing contest. Three famous gourmets were pitted against Harvey. The conditions were that each man should make and dress a salad and that the creations should be submitted to a board of competent judges. The prize was a silver loving-cup.

"I HASTENED A BIT," CONFESSED HOLMAN

The four contestants made their salads and dressed them. Just before Harvey finished his he took from his pocket a little leather case and selected a small vial therefrom. He poured three or four drops of a colorless liquid on the salad and gave it a few last, loving touches with the wooden spoon and fork.

The Frenchmen had watched Harvey closely. They knew all the other ingredients he had put in his salad, but the liquid puzzled them. The judges ate of each and, finally, after much comparison, decided that Harvey had won the prize. In their opinion, that touch of the liquid from the bottle added a unique aroma.

"What's in that bottle, George?" asked Harvey's friends when they had returned to their hotel.

"Water," replied Harvey.

"Water?" shouted the incredulous friends.

"Exactly," said Harvey—"plain water from the pump. I knew I had to do something extraordinary to win from those fellows, and I appealed to their imagination."

The Stage Struck a Rock

JULIUS KAHN, of California, who was a member of the Fifty-seventh Congress, was an actor before he went into politics.

When he first came to Washington he was inclined to dwell on his playing days. At a Gridiron Club dinner one night he was called on for a speech.

"When I was on the stage," he said, with great declamatory effect——

"Who were you driving for?" asked a strong-lunged Gridiron man.

Mr. Kahn stopped there and never began again.

A Nicotian Sermon

ONE Sunday morning Senator Hanna, accompanied by a friend, went over to Secretary Hay's house on an important matter. When the business was concluded Secretary Hay asked: "Are you going to church this morning, Mark?"

"Well, John," the Senator replied, "I suppose I am."

"I have some very good cigars," said Hay meditatively.

Hanna looked out of the window for a moment. Then he turned to his friend and said: "I wish you would go by the house and tell the folks not to wait for me. I am going to get some spiritual consolation from John Hay."

A Long Wait

ADMIRAL HICHBORN, long the Chief Constructor in the Navy, has a Chinese servant, named Chow, whom he brought with him from the East. One day Chow asked permission to go to a funeral.

"All right," said the Admiral. Then he added, "I suppose you will put a lot of food and sweetmeats on his grave as they do in China?"

"Allee same China," Chow replied.

"Now, Chow," continued the Admiral, "when do you think the dead Chinaman will come up to eat the food you leave on his grave?"

"Allee same time Melican man comes up to smellee flowers you leave on his grave," answered Chow urbanely.

Not of the Same Generation

SHELBY M. CULLOM owes much of his power in Illinois to the many courtesies he extends to the people from that State who visit Washington. During the past session of Congress he was showing a young man from Chicago through the Capitol. They came to the statue of Jefferson.

"This," said Mr. Cullom, "is the statue of Jefferson."

The Chicago man studied the statue carefully. Then he said: "It's a bad likeness. It don't look a bit like him."

"Why," remonstrated Mr. Cullom gently, "you never saw Jefferson, did you?"

"Your eye I didn't!" responded the Chicago man indignantly. "I saw him over in New York only a few nights ago in good old Rip Van Winkle."

The Hopeful Manuscript

BY LUCY MONROE

TO THE publisher, books resolve themselves into a method of making money. They become mere material for barter, and the production of them is governed by the laws of supply and demand. The only difference between his business and others lies in the uncertainty of the market. A dealer in hardware or a dealer in bananas may rely upon a certain steady demand for his product. The years may differ in the amount of it. Some months may call for more hammers and nails than others, and there are times when the appetite for bananas gives place to an overwhelming desire for strawberries. But always there are some buyers whose cupboards must be repaired and some who are loyal to the richer fruit in spite of all temptations. So the bargaining goes merrily on and the seller reaps a profit.

In the case of books the conditions are different. There is unquestionably an unceasing demand for the product in general, but for the special book there may be none. A publisher may make every preparation to satisfy a ravenous public only to find that he has offered caviare to a crowd that is hungry for ice cream. Beyond a certain point it is impossible to predict the caprices of taste. The book that is merely good fun may sell a hundred thousand, while a meagre two per cent. of that figure satisfies the demand for a work of art. Of two books that seem to the ambitious publisher equally original, one may bring him a fortune and the other lose for him everything he puts into its make-up and advertising. He aspires to please, but his diplomacy is sometimes at fault.

The uncertainties of the situation are distressing. The same expense precedes success and failure. Labor and money are never sure of a just return. At first it is trying to the nerves—the risk, the disappointments, even the successes with their accompaniment of newspaper eulogies and perversions. But gradually he grows hardened. The feverish anxiety with which he staked his money on the red gives place to a reckless indifference. The gambler learns to seem unmoved, even in the presence of disaster.

Finding the Pulse of the Public

The problem before the publisher and his literary adviser—too formidable a title to cover a mere individual—becomes a question of predicting the public taste. But in the effort to see straight they go through many phases. They accept books which have an attractive cleverness, to discover that in the rush of life it is too slight a thing to be noticed. In hopeful moments they publish promising manuscripts in the belief that the author's next book may be a masterpiece; and the next book goes, after all, to another publisher. In moments of discouragement they take up novels that seem just sentimental enough and flabby enough to please a stupid public, with the result that this special sentimentality is not of the right kind. Finally, they come back to the belief that the only possible guide lies in their own taste. It may be a faulty one, but it has a foundation of sincerity. With this for a working basis, they go through the scores of manuscripts that arrive, in eager search for a germ of originality, a glow of the real humanity. Sometimes they find these qualities only to reject them because they are concealed in circumlocutions or marked with the trail of sentimentality. But the search goes on through the innumerable rejected to one that stands out from its fellows with something of crude strength or with a delicate touch of sensibility. These are read and discussed with more care than the others, but too often the first has no grace and no refinement and the second is as fragile as porcelain. These, too, are returned, as gently as possible, but with a certain amount of frank criticism and encouragement. So the search goes on—until finally, after dreary toil and effort, some obscure manuscript suddenly stands out as if it were aflame.

This is the great moment—the moment worth living for, worth the waiting and the working. But it comes but rarely in any experience. All the other times of hopefulness are simply the search for it, the aspiration toward it. A manuscript is clever, and one wonders whether it is clever enough; another is witty, and it is hard to tell whether its wit has the warm, human touch; another tells a good story, but its dialogue is stilted and its characters brittle; another has magnetism and no plot; another is vivid and convincing, but will it pay? To this last question the argument always returns. A publisher is not a philanthropist, and though he is sometimes tempted to do a good thing for its own sake, he is generally rewarded if he does it with a discouraging indifference on the part of the public. And the next time he remembers it.

The New Writer Welcome

Yet, after all, the conditions are not so discouraging for art as some pessimistic critics imagine. Every publisher is seeking continually for a good thing, and to overlook one is in a way a disgrace. He looks for it, too, in the work of new men, and it is literally true that well-known names count for very little in his eyes. This is the day of the unknown. To him is the opportunity. In him lie the mysterious possibilities. A first book contains the magnetism, a second the disappointment, a third the struggle, a fourth too often but an uncertain hold upon a lowly position. The public tires quickly of its favorites. Even its kings are sometimes suddenly dethroned in their hour of greatest glory. Nothing is more uncertain than an assured reputation, nothing more elusive than popularity. In the new, in the unknown, lies the dream.

It comes back always—this problem—to the manuscript itself and its special qualities. If it is weak, if it is out of touch with the crowd, the most distinguished name will not carry it far. And the public is singularly shrewd. It dallies with trash sometimes to the extent of a hundred thousand; but along with the trivialities it must have some touch of magnetism, some homely truth, some sincere human feeling. And if a thing is fine, if it is fine all the way through, if it is art without a pose, or nature that rings true, it slowly makes its way. Its sales are never measured in six figures, but in one way or another it makes good. In the end it pays rather better to trust the public than to cater to its weaknesses. For the public has many ways of revenging itself for a lack of faith.

The office of an editor or a publisher is an admirable place to study life. Character is laid bare in innumerable letters and in manuscripts of a revealing intensity. One learns much of human weakness and something of the simplicity of human strength. Occasionally a writer gives of his best in his correspondence, occasionally he goes down into the depths and there is a flash of the undertruths. There are letters that amuse you, there are letters that grip you, there are letters of a fine expansive generosity. But usually the simplest letters—of those that accompany manuscripts—command the most respect. The man who describes his book at length, who tells you the reason why it will make a success, usually has little to offer. It is the writer who is willing to let his work speak for itself that really counts. But it is not through letters alone that a publisher may study life. His office is invaded by men of all temperaments, for the aspiring author has many manifestations. He is strange, he is illiterate, he is heavy, or he has a charm, but always there is something about him that is appealing. Occasionally he takes the form of a radiant creature in gorgeous raiment—rather too gorgeous for the occasion. As she enters the queer little den, the too serious reader looks up with relief from the manuscript which began well but is growing dull. It is as if the room had suddenly blossomed into color.

Books Made While You Wait

The vision speaks. "I have brought you a book," it says with a certain high condescension. "I should like a dozen copies of it within a week. My friends are very anxious to see it at once, and I know that it will make a sensation."

The editor was dazed and helpless before such admirable confidence. "If you will leave the manuscript," she suggested mildly, "I shall be glad to read it."

But this was no part of the vision's plan. "It is much too valuable to leave," she said. "I can't think of being separated from it."

"But how am I to read it, then?" protested the bewildered editor.

CORN STARCH TALK

With Receipt
For a Delightful Dessert

By MRS. HELEN ARMSTRONG

Is it not strange, knowing that starch is the most important factor in our foods, that we do not make more use of Corn Starch, which furnishes so much food value in a convenient form, easy of use, readily assimilated, and inexpensive?

The quality of the Corn Starch used, however, has much to do with its palatable taste and digestibility. Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch, which has been used for 55 years, is of unquestioned purity, and never disappoints in results. Try this brand in the following appetizing dessert and see if Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch is not well worth a prominent place in your pantry.

SNOW BALLS

Cream a third of a cup of butter and a half a cup of sugar gradually. Sift one cup of flour with half a cup of Kingsford's Corn Starch and three level teaspoons of baking powder. Add this mixture alternately with about two-thirds of a cup of milk and stir in gently the stiff whites of four eggs. Place this batter in six well buttered cups and steam for half an hour. Turn out gently, roll in powdered sugar and serve hot with

STRAWBERRY SAUCE

Cream half a cup of butter with one and a half cups of powdered sugar, add the yolk of one egg. Add a cupful of crushed berries just at serving time. Any fruit in season may be used in this way, for either steamed or baked puddings.

(To be continued.)

"Y and E"

"The Little Finger Does It."

You Flip a Slide

The simple pressing of a catch makes a "Y and E" Automatic Combination Reel either free-running or automatic. No other reel in existence does this. Do you see the point? You make your reel free-running. Then you flip the little slide, and your reel is instantly automatic. If you want to re-wind you simply press the lever with your little finger and you're ready for another cast immediately. If, instead, you get a strike, the pressure of the lever with your little finger puts the tension on your line, and Mr. Fish can't possibly get slack enough to drop your hook. Beats winding like fury with an ordinary crank reel, doesn't it? Write to-day for free instruction book and handsome catalogue "90 E."

Untie the Knot with SYSTEM

System in business is protection from snarls—protection from knotty, vexatious complications—protection from the little nuisances that waste time and money. The trivial troubles are the ones that keep you from getting things done. Insure yourself against them through system. There is no better way to learn system than by reading SYSTEM, the 96-page monthly magazine devoted to the improvement of business method. SYSTEM is useful alike to business and professional men—to employers and employees.

The president of a large lumber company says:

"It is absolutely necessary to us in the conduct of our business to have before us such information as SYSTEM gives. Our entire office system has been made up from suggestions contained in your publications."

The McCormick Harvesting Machine Co., The National Cash Register Co., Montgomery Ward & Co., American Cereal Co., Brown Hoisting Machine Co., Sherwin-Williams Co., Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co., Deere & Co., The Parry Mfg. Co., and like concerns subscribe for SYSTEM and endorse it. Some of them take as many as seven copies monthly.

SYSTEM will surely help you.

The man of experience gets in SYSTEM the experience of other men. To the young man beginning business, to the clerk, bookkeeper or student, SYSTEM is more than a business college.

The general articles will help any man—business or professional. The special articles for one's own work no man can afford to miss.

"That is of no consequence," she answered loftily. "I want it published and I would like a dozen copies within a week."

"You forget that certain formalities are necessary." The editor was beginning to get her bearings again. "We must read a book before we accept it, and we must accept it before we publish it. It is quite impossible to supply you with twelve copies in a week."

It was the vision's turn to look bewildered. "But I must have them," she exclaimed. "You don't realize how crazy my friends are to see it. I belong to the very best society and I know everybody. They will all buy the book. You needn't be at all afraid about that."

The editor, realizing that they were talking different languages, possessed herself of the precious manuscript.

"I want several of my photographs put into the book," added the vision. And the editor looked at her and agreed that it might help. She brought them out, and resplendent things they were. It was with reluctance that the editor left them to return to the manuscript. While she glanced at its incoherent banalities the vision rattled on to reassure her about her standing in society. She could not in the least understand the editor's negative when it came. She could not believe that the manuscript was not as precious to a publisher as it was to herself. She left at last quite dazed, but maintaining to the end her haughty condescension.

The Old Order Changeth

She was followed by an old man, a rather fine old man, who had been in once before.

"I received your letter this morning," he began, "and I came in to thank you for it."

The editor gave him a welcome. "There was an unexpected enthusiasm in the novel," she said; "it was the true boyish spirit that you put into your college fellows. I am more than sorry that we can't take it up."

"You criticised, I notice, the chapters about Lincoln and McPherson, but it was largely for them that I wrote the book."

"Yes, I know that," she answered, "but it is hard to do two things at once. You cannot serve God and Mammon. If you are writing a novel it is the story that is important." And she had a fleeting sense of the impertinence of these suggestions to a man who had lived his life.

He accepted them gently, but they were not of his school. "It would not satisfy me," he said, "to write a story and nothing more. If I could not give some information in it or teach some lesson it would be mere frivolity."

"But your information should be of life and character," she demurred; "your lesson should be expressed in terms of fiction."

"Wouldn't that seem very trivial?" he protested. "Isn't there a need for something more solid?"

At that she took him up. "You can give any amount of depth to a study of life. And what is the use of information which people will not read? If your novel is not a good story, if it is not absorbing as fiction, the lesson will be quite lost."

He seemed to feel that he had fallen upon degenerate days. "You may be right," he said, "but when I read a novel I like to feel that I am learning something."

"I fancy you don't read very many," the editor put in.

"No," he answered a little wistfully. "I don't care much for these things they are writing now."

"Some of them are pretty bad, I admit, but they have their value. They teach some people to read who have hardly thought of opening a book. They enlarge the reading public. Perhaps in the end they will teach it to discriminate even against themselves."

The Cohorts of the Philistine

There are many other invasions. There is the rural poet whom neither diplomacy nor expostulation will prevent from reading his verses aloud. There is the loquacious creator of a new life of Moses who has made astonishing discoveries. There is the essayist who has written heavy papers upon heavy subjects for the edification of himself and the enlightenment of humanity. And these can only be told that, admirable as their work probably is, it has no value for the publisher. Then there are novelists in all stages of feeling from confidence to timidity. The woman whose masterpiece, she is quite sure, will revolutionize the art of fiction may be followed by a quiet little creature who has done something worth while but asks

SNAP, PUSH AND GO

Is What One Should Get from Food.

A young St. Louis lady learned a food lesson she won't forget. She says: "I suffered from indigestion for nearly 10 years and although I tried all kinds of foods for breakfast I could not eat any of them until one day I discovered Grape-Nuts and now I wonder how I ever did without it.

"I am a stenographer in a business office and need all the energy possible but I formerly spent the greater part of every morning wishing I had gone without breakfast for I was continually reminded of it by the uncomfortable, distressed state of my stomach. How much ability I lost through this I could not tell you but now all is different for I eat some fruit and a saucer of Grape-Nuts and work hard all the morning and never think about my stomach until lunch time comes.

"I feel the good effects of Grape-Nuts in a sharpened brain, better memory and increased thinking capacity. The only difficulty I have about it is that I never want to limit myself to the required amount for I love it so." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There is a reason why Grape-Nuts sharpens the brain.

It's fun to make new and delicious desserts by the recipe book found in each package of Grape-Nuts.

merely for an opinion. Or perhaps it is a demure young woman, with a sweet smile and with dark rings under her eyes, who enters.

Her manuscript is presented very modestly and with the quiet comment, "I wrote it in my sleep."

The editor gasps, and she says again, "I wrote it in my sleep."

"Do you mean," comes the question, "that you dreamt the plot and wrote it out afterward?"

"No," she replies, and nothing could be more sincere than her simplicity; "I get up while asleep and write. When I waken in the morning I never remember what I have done. In my desk there is a completed story or a part of a novel. That is the only way I know."

The editor through her latticed windows takes refuge in the lake which shimmers in the sun. Then she turns to the quiet brown lady and looks for some sign of insincerity in her big dark eyes. But none is visible. They show only a kind of childlike innocence. "You do not remember the plot?" she asks.

"No. I write of things that I know nothing about when awake. It is like another life, quite different from my own. But I have sold many stories written in that way and people tell me they are good."

She explained, to satisfy an unusual curiosity, that these things could be proved, that her case had been written up in the papers, that it had excited the attention of eminent psychologists, that the book would receive a great deal of free advertising because of the way it was written.

The Final Test of a Manuscript

"But it comes back," said the editor at last, "to the manuscript itself. If the story is good, advertising will help. If it is not, it counts for nothing at all.

"You cannot force the public to take what it does not want."

And so it was left and so later it was abandoned.

Occasionally the little den is invaded by a fine personality, like the young poet who is languidly trying his wings, who has ideas and dreams—and a sense of humor which prevents him from taking himself too seriously—a sense of humor which makes him a charming companion but may keep him from being an artist. Or there is the competent literary critic who understands without an explanation, or the man of force who has obviously done things, or the genius who is of the world and yet outside of it who gives a genial twist to his humor and an exquisite turn to his phrases. And then there is the Chief, who comes in also with a manuscript.

"I have read this thing of Green's," he says, "and I agree with you that it's a good thing. But I don't believe that it would sell."

"Oh, don't you?" she protests. "Yet it deserves to sell. It has any amount of power."

"I know that. But that's not what people want. They like a more cheerful story than this. They like to forget their troubles."

"But sometimes tragedy is more absorbing than comedy. And by contrast it makes one appreciate one's blessings."

"Yes, but this is really too sordid to be tragedy."

"I know," she answers. "It is almost grimy. Yet there is that lovely heroine who comes out of it like a flower. Won't she help?"

"Surely. But she won't help enough. I can't see it. The crowd would not care for that heroine, and among the few who would there are not many who buy books."

"I believe you are right," the editor answered; "I had much the same doubt about it. Yet it deserves to succeed, and it is vastly better than a lot of the novels that do."

"I admit that," said the Chief. "And some day we'll print all the books that deserve it."

The editor took on a reflective mood. "Well, sometimes I wonder if when it comes we'll still have the chance. But after all, when we find a thing that looks like genius we do plunge on it. And perhaps between that and the books that pay there is nothing really worth while."

"That sounds like dangerous doctrine," said the Chief, "but we'll have to live up to it for a while. Then we'll do what we like. We'll accept the very best work that is offered."

And so we left it. And so the search goes on. And so there is always hope.

Oddities & Novelties of Every-Day Science

A PNEUMATIC SHIRTWAIST — Worn at sea, it is said to be as good as a pocket lifeboat built for one.

TO PUT on a life-preserver under one's ordinary clothing and wear the device without inconvenience from the start to the end of a sea voyage is now a possibility.

Essentially the new life-preserver consists of a series of small pneumatic tubes, made of canvas, muslin or other suitably flexible material, which completely surrounds the body, beginning at the waist and extending in spiral form up under the arms. These tubes are similar to those used in the inner part of pneumatic bicycle tires. The edges of the spiral series are stitched, and the tubes terminate in a mouthpiece, by which the wearer may, in emergency, inflate his life-preserver to such an extent that it will bear not only his own weight but enable him to support a group of people. This arrangement is designed particularly for strong men and swimmers who, in the presence of calamity at sea, would plan the rescue of fellow-passengers.

To support merely the wearer, however, it is not necessary that the tubes be fully inflated. Although quite small, and thus adapted to be worn with the same comfort that one would experience in donning an additional lightweight garment, the buoyant virtues of the device inhere in the great length of the series of pneumatic coils, which are capable of containing many cubic feet of air.

The new life-preserver is remarkably light. The only thing metallic about the contrivance is a small aluminum cylinder in the mouthpiece with a check-valve to hold the air after the tubes are inflated. In starting on a voyage, say from New York to Liverpool, a passenger may have his life-preserver inflated with an ordinary bicycle pump, or he may, if he wishes, puff it up himself with his own breath. After inflating the spiral device to any dimension desired, the valve is closed and the life-preserver needs no further attention. It may be worn comfortably during sleep. In addition to ordinary life-saving purposes the device may be used to advantage by people learning to swim. It is planned to equip sailors and life-saving crews with these preservers, as they will not interfere with any freedom of movement necessary.

In the cabins of well-appointed steamers are placards calling attention to life-preservers in racks overhead or deftly tucked under berths. Though these afford a sense of security against storm and shipwreck, many passengers do not know how to use them and often in moments of panic fail to take advantage of them. Wearing one of the new preservers, a passenger cannot be taken unawares. Although unable to swim and pitched without warning into the sea, it is said to be impossible for a person, wearing a pneumatic life-preserver, to sink.

MILLIONS FOR THE SOUTH — A new system of tapping that saves all the resin and turpentine and does not kill the tree.

IT IS the carefully worked out estimate of Dr. Gifford Pinchot, Chief Forester of the United States, that the recent invention of a simple device will result in an annual increase of at least $13,000,000 in the revenue from the turpentine and resin industry of Southern pine forests.

Experiments with the new system of tapping the trees show a minimum gain in turpentine and resin of 23 per cent. In many instances the increase is from 75 to 100 per cent. Some of the Cuban or "slash" pines yield the surprising increase of from 300 to 400 per cent., as compared with the production by the present system of boxing. A further advantage, more vital, perhaps, even than the additional millions in annual returns, is that by the abolition of boxing the least possible damage is done the trees. Instead of the former mutilation the new system necessitates only shallow clipping.

The total value of the turpentine and resin crop of 1902 was something more than $17,000,000. Had the new method been known then the product would have yielded a return of over $30,000,000. Instead of 600,000 barrels of turpentine, this new device would have caused a production of 1,050,000 barrels. The resin product of 1902 was 2,100,000 barrels. The new process would have filled 4,675,000 barrels. A gain of nearly three million barrels in resin and turpentine is a great claim to be made for a

Winners of Advertising
Who Attract Attention

How I Qualified Them by Mail Instruction in a Few Months to Fill Important Positions

By GEORGE H. POWELL

THE readers of THE SATURDAY EVENING POST have been deeply interested in my talks about the great and growing business of advertising writing, and about the principles which govern success in this celebrated vocation.

Scarcely a day passes that I do not receive letters of inquiry from prominent educators and business colleges, who realize that the teaching of ad. writing by correspondence is a factor in business and educational life that must of necessity continue to grow more and more in influence and power year by year.

Indeed, there is little doubt that the progressive business men of the future will no more think of getting along without the assistance of the competent ad. writer than they would now think of getting along without a trained bookkeeper.

I have written much concerning the marvelous achievements of young men and women who have taken my course of instruction and are to-day filling high-salaried positions as advertising managers and writers in various parts of the country, and I shall continue along the same line this week.

In all the world there is nothing so encouraging, so stimulating, so convincing as the living example, and in the achievements of J. A. Brainard and Wm. H. Lidell, which I am about to note, the prospective student will doubtless find numerous replies to many a mental question raised in regard to his or her chances of succeeding through enrollment in the Powell System.

I have selected these two young men as representative of two different types — one a college man and the other from the humbler walks.

Mr. Brainard was recently made advertising manager of the great firm of Brill Brothers, one of New York's largest clothiers and furnishers, embracing a system of four immense retail establishments. About a year ago Mr. Brainard was obliged to leave Dartmouth College on account of his health, and ere long he drifted to the great metropolis, where he moved around like a square peg in a round hole. In other words, he was trying to secure a footing in the ordinary business walks, and it soon dawned upon him that the city was full of thousands of clerks and subordinates just as capable of drawing meagre weekly salaries as he was.

Some mature reflection resulted in the absolute conviction that if he was to win early success it must be in some vocation not crowded with half-paid workers. One of his friends, occupying a responsible position in Hapgoods, the most important institution of its kind in the world, which secures only high-class, skilled workers for the largest manufacturers in America, told him to take up the study of ad. writing, as there were not half enough competent writers of advertising to meet the demand. Mr. Brainard then took up the Powell System as advised, and in a few months attained such proficiency that he was later appointed to his present position, where he has demonstrated his ability in a most promising manner. In teaching him, I devoted much time to catchy illustrations and the chatty style of writing. No one is born with advertising originality, and Mr. Brainard will cheerfully testify to the fact. He will also volunteer the information that the Powell System is in reality a kindergarten system in many respects, since the teaching, so far as it relates to idea originality, consists in analysis of a host of actual advertisements which are replete with advertising principles and object lessons, and which stimulate the student and cause him or her to "see things." These resulting illustrative ideas on the part of the student, as was the case with Mr. Brainard, are at first usually weak and withal commonplace, but week by week the improvement continues until one fine day it is seen that the true advertising spirit has at last been developed. This may come about in three or four months or sooner, and thereafter, until the course is completed, it is merely continued drilling to thoroughly and indelibly impress the true advertising principles on the brain so that they can be applied anywhere.

Mr. Lidell, the new advertising manager of the C. E. Barker Mfg. Co., 56-58 Warren St., New York, was filling a position of no consequence a year ago on little Governor's Island, and the Powell System is responsible for his present skill. The Barker Company are originators of advertising systems, including the famous trading stamps, and for a graduate of mine to fit into such a responsible place in so brief a time means a good deal.

It means among other things that I can make a competent ad. writer from anyone possessing an average education, such as our grammar and high schools afford, plus perseverance.

And I cannot too strongly caution the prospective student against the fatal error of instability, since it is a thousand times more at fault than any lack of talent.

He who is unwilling to devote on an average of an hour or so per evening for months has nothing to gain by my instructions.

Business men and those who have their way to make in the world will be interested in my new Prospectus, which is the most instructive ever issued. It also contains an abundance of testimony that gives the facts as they are. To obtain a copy simply address me, George H. Powell, 199 Temple Court, New York, N. Y.

EXPERT TESTIMONY

Coffee Tried and Found Guilty.

No one who has studied its effects on the human body can deny that coffee is a strong drug and liable to cause all kinds of ills, while Postum is a food drink and a powerful rebuilder that will correct the ills caused by coffee when used steadily in place of coffee.

An expert who has studied the subject says: "I have studied the value of foods and the manufacture of food products from personal investigation and wish to bear testimony to the wonderful qualities of Postum Cereal Coffee. I was an excessive coffee drinker, although I knew it to be a slow poison. First it affected my nerves and then my heart, but when I once tried Postum I found it easy to give up the coffee, confirmed coffee fiend though I was.

"Postum satisfied my craving for coffee and since drinking Postum steadily in place of the coffee all my troubles have disappeared and I am again healthy and strong.

"I know that even where coffee is not taken to excess it has bad effects on the constitution in some form or other, and I am convinced by my investigation that the only thing to do if health and happiness are of any value to one is to quit coffee and drink Postum." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

little contrivance. Yet these are the conservative figures of Government scientists, founded on thorough practical tests.

Of such significance is the new system in arresting the present wasteful and injurious method of harvesting turpentine and resin that the United States Government has secured special rates from Southern railroads to haul the new equipments in carload lots.

Furthermore, in order that operators in this industry may secure the great advantages of the new method at once, the Government offers scientific aid in the field in the installation of the method. All this is given without charge.

Inasmuch as the system has been perfected by Dr. Charles H. Herty, an expert in the Government employ, the principles of the discovery are given without reservation, so that the turpentine men will be able to change to the better method with little expense.

In Doctor Herty's system an earthen cup of the same capacity as the standard box is used to catch the crude turpentine. Through a half-inch hole in a stout rim at the top the cup is suspended from a nail driven into the tree. Two thin galvanized sheet-iron gutters, two inches wide and from six to twelve inches long, and bent lengthwise through the middle at an angle of 120 degrees, convey the resin to the cup.

These are the essentials of the new system, which may be applied to trees previously boxed, as well as to new timber. In making the converging incisions for the reception of the sheet-iron gutters some scientific care is required.

Also, in the hanging of the cups great precision is necessary. As these soon fill with rain water, a law of physics has been followed, by which the resin, although at first of less specific gravity than water, is finally caused to sink to the lower side of the cup. Each additional drop of rain forces out a drop of water. No resin is lost, either by escape over the edge of the receptacle or by evaporation of the spirits of turpentine.

In addition to giving this invention to the turpentine industry, securing special transportation schedules for the equipment, and offering without charge to superintend its installation, the Government has obtained offers from manufacturers to turn out these cups and galvanized gutters at special wholesale rates.

AN ENERGETIC CHEESE—Investigation shows that some cheeses are ninety per cent. potential energy.

EFFORTS are being made by the Government to extend the manufacture of cheese in the United States and to increase its consumption. Recent experiments with the common American brand of cheese show its food value to be very great. In these tests ninety-three per cent. of the protein and ninety-five per cent. of the fat were digested, the available energy produced being ninety-three per cent. Notwithstanding its remarkably nourishing qualities, cheese is eaten only to a very limited extent in the United States. In fact, it constitutes less than half of one per cent. of the total food consumed in this country. That small quantity represents 1.6 per cent. of the total protein and 1.6 of the total fat in America's food supply.

After several years of careful study of the subject scientists have evolved a plan to popularize cheese in the United States. They are convinced that the system of making large cheeses, which in the retail trade are carved by grocers into awkward slices, has greatly handicapped the industry. The cheese thus prepared and sold is not strikingly tempting.

Noting that print butter brings a higher price than that article in bulk, and is in far greater demand, Professor E. H. Farrington reasoned that cheese put up in pound packages, each one bearing the imprint of the maker, would enhance its sale. But the curing of cheese in one-pound packages presented a difficult problem. Professor Farrington solved it by devising a carved board for use in a rectangular cheese mould which makes sixteen impressions on the cheese, stamping it and dividing it into one-pound prints.

What recommends the method particularly is that it opens a profitable thing to individual dairy farmers. At present less than six per cent. of all the cheese manufactured in the United States is made on farms. Factories control the industry. They turn out annually about 300,000,000 pounds. The new plan of printing pound cheeses gives promise not only of stimulating the general trade but also of enabling farmers to gain reputation for their brands, even where the output of a dairy is limited.

AN EARLY WRECK

Duffy reached toward the lantern which afforded the only light.

"If you touch the light I begin to shoot," said Tyce; and someway every one knew that he meant it. In various ways the nerves of the regulators received an impression of the difference between a remonstrance and a gatling-gun ready for action.

Bob Terhune had only a vague, whirling impression of all this, and to him the light went out. When it returned it shone glimmeringly from a tin reflector behind an oil lamp fastened to the wall. Two men moved uncertainly about him. One was young Doctor Howell, the other was Tyce, and Tyce was telling the young doctor what to do.

Next morning Bob knew perfectly well that he was lying on a battered horsehair sofa in Tyce's office. The lawyer brought him some breakfast from the hotel.

"What happened?" said Bob feebly.

"Nothing at all, my boy," said Tyce cheerfully, "except that you got your head cracked."

"They—the others?" His eager eyes were fixed on the lawyer's face.

"The Cressets are all right. Their Eagle's had its tail pulled out, but they're all right."

Bob hated the man with a feeble jealousy for a moment and went to sleep. Later in the day he roused and lay speculating. Would Miss Lydia know anything about him? Would she care anything about him now?

Amid his speculation Miss Lydia herself entered. She drew a chair and sat down beside his battered horsehair sofa. "Oh, Bob," she moaned, "are you much hurt? Do you feel better?"

"I'm all right," he murmured.

She met the boy's hungry, humble, blue eyes. A deep, unused, unexpected instinct of maternity stirred in her maidenly breast. She lifted his battered head in her arms and laid her cheek beside his bandages. "Oh, dear Bob! We're all broke up and we're going back to Ohio," she said.

But what she said did not matter. She held his head in her arms and bent her cheek beside him. Bob closed his eyes, and for a moment he wished that he were about to die.

She lowered his head to the soiled pillow. "I'm sure you'll get along well, Bob," she said. "You were so brave. We'll always remember you. We're going to-night. I must say good-by."

For an instant Bob thrilled to the tips of his toes as his swooning, ecstatic thought formed the daring question, "Will she kiss me?"

"Good-by," he murmured.

"Good-by, Bob," said Miss Lydia more briskly, and stood up. "He will get along well, won't he?" she added with an entreating note.

And Bob heard James E. Tyce replying gallantly, "Certainly. I will answer for him."

Miss Lydia went out, and Bob understood that James E. Tyce had stood by, a smiling, shameless spectator of the sacred scene.

"Well, you're going to get along all right, aren't you, Bob—with me?" said Tyce cheerfully.

Lydia was gone. Tyce had seen everything. This cheerfulness was the straw too much.

"I'm going to get along all right," said Bob fiercely; "but I suppose you'll be going back to Ohio."

"Ohio?" the lawyer repeated, at a loss. He looked down at the helplessly jealous blue eyes. Then, slowly and gravely, he took the chair which she had occupied. He pushed his beard up to his mouth, and for an exquisite instant Bob's soul was pierced with the suspicion that he was hiding a grin. But when his face was disclosed it was very grave.

"No, there's no Ohio for me, Bob—or for you. We've both lost the stake. Your advantage is that you have a longer time to forget about it in, and mine is that I've lost my stake a good many times before. Probably that's why I can keep my temper."

Bob looked away and felt himself small and young.

Again Tyce pushed his beard up to his mouth; then went on: "We're a good deal in the same boat all around. I suppose there'll be some coldness toward both of us on the part of our fellow-citizens. We might strike up a sort of partnership—now that the Eagle

An Absorbing Serial

Story of Western Railroad Life

By

FRANK H. SPEARMAN

This story was accepted for publication because:

It pictures really unfamiliar phases of railroad life.

It is more absorbingly interesting than any of the railroad stories that have appeared during the past ten years.

Its hero (Ab Glover) is a typical American, whose chief joy in life is in overcoming difficulties.

Its heroine is a fine womanly girl, who is the centre of a powerful love story.

has flung itself to the breeze and flown away. How would you like to stay in my office and study law with me?"

Bob merely gasped at him for an instant. "But—would you?" he asked incredulously.

"I would," said Tyce, and laughed openly.

"But—I—I don't know very much," Bob stammered.

"Well, I don't know very much, either," said Tyce genially. He bent forward. "Only you can stand pat when the time comes. I know that. I like that—even if I've mostly lost at it. We'll form the partnership."

Despotism and Democracy

Scipio opened the front door, and announcing that Miss Maitland was at home, showed Julian Crane and Annette into the drawing-room. As they walked briskly to the fireplace they saw the two persons on the sofa start apart. Thorndyke rose to his feet. Having been accepted, he was once more master of himself and of the situation. Constance cowered in the corner of the sofa.

"Pray excuse us," cried Annette, laughing, blushing and hesitating.

"There is nothing to excuse," replied Thorndyke coolly. "Miss Maitland has just promised to marry me. I am sure I don't know why, but I am very much obliged to her, all the same."

Annette reached out and took Thorndyke's hand in hers.

"I know why," she said; "any woman would know why."

Crane shook Thorndyke's hand warmly.

Constance, too, rose, and without a word, but with rapture in her eyes and smile, received Annette's kiss and Crane's cordial grasp of the hand.

"I suppose," said Annette, "you are too blissfully happy to be interested in anything now, but when you come to your senses I am sure both of you will rejoice with us. We have just had a dispatch from Senator Bicknell, saying my husband was elected Senator, at four o'clock to-day, on the fifth ballot."

And then Crane spoke, with sincerity in his eye and his smile:

"We came straight to you for sympathy in our good fortune—for which we are wholly indebted to Senator Bicknell. And we find you enjoying the good fortune that befell us ten years ago. Ah, there is no such good fortune on this earth, Thorndyke, as a good wife!"

(THE END)

The Festive Filipino

THE War Department is in receipt of a communication from the Philippines which gives an amusing account of the ready musical talent of the Filipino people. Upon hearing an air for the first time some of the native performers can reproduce it, frequently with little or no flaw or variation. Marches, hymns, operatic selections and ragtime melodies are all eagerly added to their repertoire. American tunes, the communication states, are particularly catching, rag-time especially appealing to the lively imagination of the Filipino. Although quick to take up our music, they are far less ready in acquiring the English language. In consequence they have adopted and now render on solemn occasions American airs that appeal to them, utterly unconscious that the words are totally at variance with the occasion. At one town the Filipino citizens had assembled to honor Governor Taft, and when he walked to the platform the native band, to the great amusement of the Governor and his staff, struck up, "Good-Morning, Carrie."

More incongruous still was the tune Governor Taft heard in a funeral procession. A Filipino of standing had passed away and the obsequies were designed to be imposing. In the cortège behind the hearse marched a native band. Not a member of it understood English. With dirgelike movement, but with startling fidelity to the American tune, the musicians played, "There'll Be a Hot Time in the Old Town To-Night."

The most artistic and durable color effects on shingles are produced with Shingletint, which is a scientific combination of linseed oil, coloring matter, creosote, and the necessary drying agents.

Among the many shingle stains offered, Shingletint is conspicuous not only for its superiority, but because it can be called for by its distinctive name, thus offering the consumer protection against inferior goods offered for the same purpose.

When buying Shingle Stains it will be worth while to ignore the "just as good" argument and insist upon Shingletint.

A Trip to the Seashore!

Any Boy Can Go

ARCHIE EADIE sells THE SATURDAY EVENING POST in a small town in New Jersey. One morning last summer he eagerly watched a crowd of people boarding an excursion train for the big camp-meetings at Ocean Grove and wished that he was going with them. He had a little more than enough money for car-fare, but nothing for board and spending money. Then an idea came to him. He wrote to the publishers of THE POST to add 100 copies to his order for that week and to send them to him at Ocean Grove. Two days later he was among those who boarded the excursion train.

When he got to Ocean Grove he found his copies waiting for him and started at once for the beach with a bundle of them. The knowledge that unless he sold the copies he would not have money to pay for his board gave extra vigor to his work. Up and down the boardwalk, into the pavilions, on the hotel porches and along the streets he went, offering the magazine. Wherever there was a crowd there was Archie. Late in the afternoon he went to the boarding-house and engaged board for a week, tired but happy, for he had almost enough to pay the bill.

Before the end of the week he received a check for $5.00, one of the cash prizes offered monthly to THE POST boys. He wrote for 50 extra copies for the next week. These he readily disposed of and decided he would stay a few days longer. At the end of that time he returned home, sunburned and happy, with enough money left to order his next week's supply for "home consumption." Archie is 12 years old. He writes: "That way of going to camp-meeting suits me all right."

CHARLES LIVINGSTON BULL

I—Into the Primitive

BUCK did not read the newspapers, or he would have known that trouble was brewing, not alone for himself but for every tidewater dog, strong of muscle and with warm, long hair, from Puget Sound to San Diego. Because men, groping in the Arctic darkness, had found a yellow metal, and because steamship and transportation companies were booming the find, thousands of men were rushing into the Northland. These men wanted dogs, and the dogs they wanted were heavy dogs, strong of muscle and with warm, long hair.

Buck lived at a big house in the sun-kissed Santa Clara Valley; Judge Miller's place, it was called. It stood back from the road, half-hidden among the trees, through which glimpses could be caught of the great cool veranda that ran around its four sides. The house was approached by graveled driveways which wound about through wide-spreading lawns and under the interlacing boughs of tall poplars. At the rear things were on even a more spacious scale than at the front. There were great stables, where a dozen grooms and boys held forth, rows of vine-clad servants' cottages, an endless and orderly array of outhouses, long grape arbors, green pastures, orchards and berry patches. Then there was the pumping plant for the artesian well, and the big cement tank where Judge Miller's boys took their morning plunge and kept cool in the hot afternoons. And over this great demesne Buck ruled. Here he was born, and here he had lived the four years of his life. It was true, there were other dogs. There could not but be other dogs on so vast a place, but they did not count. They came and went, resided in the populous kennels, or lived obscurely in the recesses of the house after the fashion of Toots, the Japanese pug, or Ysabel, the Mexican hairless—strange creatures that rarely put nose out of doors or set foot to ground. On the other hand, there were the fox terriers, a score of them at least, who yelped fearful promises at Toots and Ysabel looking out of the windows and protected by a legion of housemaids armed with brooms and mops.

But Buck was neither house-dog nor kennel-dog. The whole realm was his. He plunged into the swimming tank or went hunting with the Judge's sons; he escorted Mollie and Alice, the Judge's daughters, on long twilight or early morning rambles; on wintry nights he lay at the Judge's feet before the roaring library fire; he carried the Judge's grandsons on his back or rolled them in the grass, and guarded their footsteps through wild adventures down to the fountain in the stable yard, and even beyond, where the paddocks were and the berry patches. Among the terriers he stalked imperiously, and Toots and Ysabel he utterly ignored, for he was King, king over all creeping, crawling, flying things of Judge Miller's place, humans included.

His father, Elmo, a huge St. Bernard, had been the Judge's inseparable companion, and Buck bade fair to follow in the way of his father. He was not so large—he weighed only one hundred and forty pounds—for his mother, Shep, had been a Scotch shepherd dog. Nevertheless, one hundred and forty pounds, to which was added the dignity that comes of good living and universal respect, enabled him to carry himself in right royal fashion. During the four years since his puppyhood he had lived the life of a sated aristocrat; he had a fine pride in himself, was even a trifle egotistical, just as country gentlemen sometimes become because of their insular situation. But he had saved himself by not becoming a mere pampered house-dog. Hunting and kindred outdoor delights had kept down the fat and hardened his muscles; and like the cold-tubbing races, the love of water had been to him a tonic and a health-preserver.

And this was the manner of dog Buck was in the fall of 1897, when the Klondike Rush sprang up and dragged men from all the world into the frozen North. But Buck did not read the newspapers, and he did not know that Manuel, one of the gardener's helpers, was an undesirable acquaintance. Manuel had one besetting sin. He loved to play Chinese lottery. Also, in his gambling, he had one besetting weakness: faith in a system, and this made his damnation certain. For to play a system requires money, whereas the wages of a gardener's helper do not lap over the needs of a wife and numerous progeny.

The Judge was at a meeting of the Raisin Growers' Association and the boys were busy organizing an athletic club on the memorable night of Manuel's treachery. No one saw him and Buck go off through the orchard on what Buck imagined was merely a stroll. And with the exception of a solitary man, no one saw them arrive at the little flag station known as College Park. This man talked with Manuel, and money chinked between them.

"You might wrap up the goods before you deliver 'm," the stranger said gruffly, and Manuel doubled a piece of stout rope around Buck's neck under the collar.

"Twist it, an' you'll choke 'm plentee," said Manuel, and the stranger grunted a ready affirmative.

Buck had accepted the rope with quiet dignity. To be sure, it was an unwonted performance, but he had learned to trust in men he knew and to give them credit for a wisdom that outreached his own. But when the ends of the rope were placed in the stranger's hands he growled menacingly. He merely intimated his displeasure, in his pride believing that to intimate was to command. But to his surprise the rope tightened around his neck, shutting off his breath. In quick rage he sprang at the man, who met him half-way, grappled him close by the throat, and with a deft twist threw him over on his back. Then the rope tightened mercilessly, while Buck struggled in a fury, his tongue lolling out of his mouth and his great chest panting futilely. Never in all his life had he been so vilely treated, and never in all his life had he been so angry. But his strength ebbed, his eyes glazed, and he knew nothing when the train was flagged and the two men threw him into the baggage car.

The next he knew he was dimly aware that his tongue was hurting and that he was being jolted along in some kind of a conveyance. The hoarse shriek of a locomotive, whistling a crossing, told him where he was. He had traveled too often with the Judge not to know the sensation of riding in a baggage car. He opened his eyes, and into them came the unbridled anger of a kidnaped king. The man sprang for his throat, but Buck was too quick for him. His jaws closed on the hand, nor did they relax till his senses were choked out of him once more.

"Yep; has fits," the man said, hiding his mangled hand from the baggageman, who had been attracted by the sounds of struggle. "I'm takin' 'm up for the boss to 'Frisco. A crack dog-doctor there thinks he can cure 'em."

Concerning that night's ride the man spoke most eloquently for himself in a little shed back of a saloon on the San Francisco water front.

Digitized by Google

"All I get is fifty for it," he grumbled. "An' I wouldn't do it over for a thousand, cold cash."

His hand was wrapped in a bloody handkerchief, and the right trouser-leg was ripped from knee to ankle.

"How much did the other mug get?" the saloonkeeper demanded.

"A hundred," was the reply. "Wouldn't take a sou less, so help me."

"That makes a hundred and fifty," the saloonkeeper calculated; "and he's worth it, or I'm a squarehead."

The kidnaper undid the bloody wrappings and looked at his lacerated hand. "If I don't get the hydrophoby——"

"It'll be because you was born to hang," laughed the saloonkeeper. "Here, lend me a hand before you pull your freight," he added.

Dazed, suffering intolerable pain from throat and tongue, with the life half throttled out of him, Buck attempted to face his tormentors. But he was thrown down and choked repeatedly, till they succeeded in filing the heavy brass collar from off his neck. Then the rope was removed and he was flung into a cagelike crate. There he lay for the remainder of the weary night, nursing his wrath and wounded pride. He could not understand what it all meant. What did they want with him, these strange men? Why were they keeping him pent up in this narrow crate? He did not know why, but he felt oppressed by the vague sense of impending calamity. Several times during the night he sprang to his feet when the shed-door rattled open, expecting to see the Judge, or the boys at least. But each time it was the bulging face of the saloonkeeper that peered in at him by the sickly light of a tallow candle. And each time the joyful bark that trembled in Buck's throat was twisted into a savage growl.

But the saloonkeeper let him alone, and in the morning four men entered and picked up the crate. More tormentors, Buck decided, for they were evil-looking creatures, ragged and unkempt; and he stormed and raged at them through the bars. They only laughed and poked sticks at him, which he promptly assailed with his teeth till he realized that that was what they wanted. Whereupon he lay down sullenly and allowed the crate to be lifted into a wagon. Then he, and the crate in which he was imprisoned, began a passage through many hands. Clerks in the express office took charge of him; he was carted about in another wagon; a truck carried him, with an assortment of boxes and parcels, upon a ferry steamer; he was trucked off the steamer into a great railway depot; and finally he was deposited in an express car.

For two days and nights this express car was dragged along at the tail of shrieking locomotives. And for two days and nights Buck neither ate nor drank. In his anger he had met the first advances of the express messengers with growls, and they had retaliated by teasing him. When he flung himself against the bars, quivering and frothing, they laughed at him and taunted him. They growled and barked like detestable dogs, mewed, and flapped their arms and crowed. It was all very silly, he knew, but therefore the more outrage to his dignity, and his anger waxed and waxed. He did not mind the hunger so much, but the lack of water caused him severe suffering and fanned his wrath to fever-pitch. For that matter, high-strung and finely sensitive, the ill-treatment had flung him into a fever, which was fed by the inflammation of his parched and swollen throat and tongue.

He was glad for one thing: the rope was off his neck. That had given them an unfair advantage; but now that it was off he would show them. They should never get another rope around his neck. Upon that he was resolved. For two days and nights he neither ate nor drank, and during those two days and nights of torment he accumulated a fund of wrath that boded ill for whomever first fell foul of him. His eyes turned bloodshot; he became metamorphosed into a raging fiend. So changed was he that the Judge himself would not have recognized him; while the express messengers breathed with relief when they bundled him off the train at Seattle.

FRANÇOIS

Four men gingerly carried the crate from the wagon into a small, high-walled back yard. A stout man with a red sweater that sagged generously at the neck came out and signed the book for the driver. That was the man, Buck divined, the next tormentor, and he hurled himself savagely against the bars. The man smiled grimly, and brought a hatchet and a club.

"You ain't going to take him out now?" the driver asked.

"Sure," the man replied, driving the hatchet into the crate.

There was an instantaneous scattering of the four men who had carried it in, and from safe perches on the wall they prepared to watch the performance.

Buck rushed at the splintering wood, sinking his teeth into it, surging and wrestling with it. Wherever the hatchet fell on the outside he was there on the inside, snarling and growling, as furiously anxious to get out as the man in the red sweater was calmly intent on getting him out.

"Now, you red-eyed devil," he said, when he had made an opening sufficient for the passage of Buck's body. At the same time he dropped the hatchet and shifted the club to his right hand.

And Buck was truly a red-eyed devil as he drew himself together for the spring, hair bristling, mouth foaming, and a mad glitter in his bloodshot eyes. Straight at the man he launched his one hundred and forty pounds of fury, surcharged with the pent passion of two days and nights. In midair, just as his jaws were about to close on the man, he received a shock that checked his body and brought his teeth together with an agonizing clip. He whirled over, fetching the ground on his back and side; he had never been struck by a club in his life and did not understand. With a snarl that was part bark and more scream, he was on his feet and launched into the air again. And again the shock came and he was brought crushingly to the ground. This time he knew it was the club, but his madness knew no caution. A dozen times he charged, and as often the club broke the charge and smashed him down.

Following upon a particularly fierce blow he crawled to his feet, too dazed to rush. He staggered limply about, the blood flowing from nose and mouth and ears, his beautiful coat sprayed and flecked with bloody slaver. Then the man advanced and deliberately dealt him a frightful blow on the nose. All the pain he had endured was as nothing compared with the exquisite agony of this. With a roar that was almost lionlike in its ferocity he again hurled himself at the man. But the man, shifting the club from right to left, coolly caught him by the under jaw, at the same time wrenching downward and backward. Buck described a complete circle in the air, and half of another, then crashed to the ground on his head and chest.

For the last time he rushed. The man struck the shrewd blow he had purposely withheld for so long, and Buck crumpled up and went down, knocked utterly senseless.

"He's no slouch at dog-breakin', that's wot I say," one of the men on the wall cried enthusiastically.

"'Druther break cayuses any day, and twice on Sundays," was the reply of the driver as he climbed on to the wagon and started the horses.

Buck's senses came back to him, but not his strength. He lay where he had fallen, and from there he watched the man in the red sweater.

"'Answers to the name of Buck,'" the man soliloquized, quoting from the saloonkeeper's letter, which had announced the consignment of the crate and contents. "Well, Buck, my boy," he went on in a genial voice, "we've had our little ruction, and the best thing we can do is to let it go at that. You've learned your place, and I know mine. Be a good dog and all'll go well and the goose hang high. Be a bad dog and I'll whale the stuffin' outer yer. Understand?"

As he spoke he fearlessly patted the head he had so mercilessly pounded, and though Buck's hair involuntarily bristled at the touch he endured it without protest. When the man brought him water he drank eagerly, and later bolted a generous meal of raw meat, chunk by chunk, from the man's hand.

He was beaten (he knew that); but he was not broken. He saw, once for all, that he stood no chance against a man with a club. He had learned the lesson, and in all his after life he never forgot it. That club was a revelation. It was his introduction to the reign of primitive law, and he met the introduction half-way. The facts of life took on a fiercer aspect; and though he faced that aspect uncowed, he faced it with all the latent cunning of his nature aroused. As the days went by other dogs came, in crates and at the ends of ropes, some docilely and some raging and roaring as he had come; and one and all, he watched them pass under the dominion of the man in the red sweater. Again and again, as he looked at each brutal performance, the lesson was driven home to Buck: a man with a club was a lawgiver, a master to be obeyed, though not necessarily conciliated. Of this last Buck was never guilty, though he did see beaten dogs that fawned upon the man and wagged their tails and licked his hand. Also, he saw one dog that would neither be conciliated nor obey finally killed in the struggle for mastery.

Now and again men came, strangers, who talked excitedly, wheedlingly, and in all kinds of fashions to the man in the red sweater. And at such times that money passed between them the strangers took one or more of the dogs away with them. Buck wondered where they went, for they never came back; but the fear of the future was strong upon him, and he was glad, each time, when he was not selected.

Yet his time came, in the end, in the form of a little weazened man who spat broken English and many strange and uncouth exclamations which Buck could not understand.

"Sacrédam!" he cried, when his eyes lit upon Buck, "Dat one dam bully dog! Eh? How moch?"

"Three hundred, and a present at that," was the prompt reply of the man in the red sweater. "And seein' it's government money, you ain't got no kick coming, eh, Perrault?"

Perrault grinned. Considering that the price of dogs had been boomed skyward by the unwonted demand, it was not an unfair sum for so fine an animal. The Canadian Government would be no loser, nor would its dispatches travel the slower.

Perrault knew dogs, and when he looked at Buck he knew that he was one in a thousand—— "One in ten t'ousand," he commented mentally.

Buck saw money pass between them, and was not surprised when Curly, a good-natured Newfoundland, and he were led away by the little weazened man. That was the last he saw of the man in the red sweater, and as Curly and he looked at receding Seattle from the deck of the Narwhal, it was the last he saw of the warm Southland. Curly and he were taken below by Perrault and turned over to a black-faced giant called François. Perrault was a French-Canadian, and swarthy; but François was a French-Canadian half-breed, and twice as swarthy. They were a new kind of men to Buck (of which he was destined to see many more), and though he developed no affection for them, he none the less grew honestly to respect them. He speedily learned that Perrault and François were fair men, calm and impartial in administering justice, and too wise in the way of dogs to be ever fooled by dogs.

In the 'tween decks of the Narwhal, Buck and Curly joined two other dogs. One of them was a big, snow-white fellow from Spitzbergen who had been brought away by a whaling captain, and who had later accompanied a Geological Survey into the Barrens. He was friendly, in a treacherous sort of way, smiling into one's face the while he meditated some underhand trick; as, for instance, when he stole from Buck's food at the first meal. As Buck sprang to punish him the lash of François' whip sang through the air, reaching the culprit first; and nothing remained to Buck but to recover the bone.

That was fair of François, he decided, and the half-breed began his rise in Buck's estimation.

The other dog made no advances nor received any; also, he did not attempt to steal from the newcomers. He was a gloomy, morose fellow, and he showed Curly plainly that all he desired was to be left alone, and further, that there would be trouble if he were not left alone. Dave, he was called, and he ate and slept or yawned between times, and took interest in nothing, not even when the Narwhal crossed Queen Charlotte Sound and rolled and pitched and bucked like a thing possessed. When Buck and Curly grew excited, half wild with fear, he raised his head as though annoyed, favored them with an incurious glance, yawned, and went to sleep again.

Day and night the ship throbbed to the tireless pulse of the propeller, and though one day was very like another it was apparent to Buck that the weather was steadily growing colder. At last, one morning the propeller was quiet and the Narwhal was pervaded with an atmosphere of excitement. He felt it, as did the other dogs, and knew that a change was at hand. François leashed them and brought them on deck. At the first step upon the cold surface Buck's feet sank into a white mushy something very like mud. He sprang back with a snort. More of this white stuff was falling through the air. He shook himself, but more of it fell upon him. He sniffed it curiously, then licked some up on his tongue. It bit like fire, and the next instant was gone. This puzzled him. He tried it again with the same result. The onlookers laughed uproariously, and he felt ashamed, he knew not why. It was his first snow.

II—The Law of Club and Fang

BUCK'S first day on the Dyea beach was like a nightmare. Every hour was filled with shock and surprise. He had been suddenly jerked from the heart of civilization and flung into the heart of things primordial. No lazy, sun-kissed life was this, with nothing to do but loaf and be bored. Here was neither peace, nor rest, nor a moment's safety. All was confusion and action, and every moment life and limb were in peril. There was imperative need to be constantly alert, for these dogs and men were not town dogs and men. They were savages, all of them, who knew no law but the law of club and fang.

He had never seen dogs fight as these wolfish creatures fought, and his first experience taught him an unforgetable lesson. It is true, it was a vicarious experience, else he would not have lived to profit by it. Curly was the victim. They were camped near the log store, where she in her friendly way made advances to a husky-dog the size of a full-grown wolf, though not half so large as she. There was no warning, only a leap in like a flash, a metallic clip of teeth, a leap out equally swift, and Curly's face was ripped open from eye to jaw.

It was the wolf manner of fighting, to strike and leap away; but there was more to it than this. Thirty or forty huskies ran to the spot and surrounded the combatants in an intent and silent circle. Buck did not comprehend that silent intentness, nor the eager way with which they were licking their chops. Curly rushed her antagonist, who struck again and leaped aside. He met her next rush with his chest, in a peculiar fashion that tumbled her off her feet. She never regained them. This was for what the onlooking huskies had waited. They closed in upon her, snarling and yelping, and she was buried beneath the bristling mass of bodies.

So sudden was it and so unexpected that Buck was taken aback. He saw Spitz run out his scarlet tongue in a way he had of laughing; and he saw François, swinging an ax, spring into the mess of dogs. Three men with clubs were helping him to scatter them. It did not take long. Two minutes from the time Curly went down the last of her assailants were clubbed off. But she lay there limp and lifeless in the bloody, trampled snow, almost torn to pieces, the swarthy half-breed standing over her and cursing horribly. The scene often came back to Buck to trouble him in his sleep. So that was the way. No fair play. Once down, that was the end of you. Well, he would see to it that he never went down. Spitz ran out his tongue and laughed again, and from that moment Buck hated him with a bitter and deathless hatred.

Before he had recovered from the shock caused by the tragic passing of Curly he received another shock. François fastened on him an arrangement of straps and buckles. It was a harness, such as he had seen the grooms put on the horses at home. And as he had seen horses work, so he was set to work, hauling François on a sled to the forest that fringed the valley, and returning with a load of firewood. Though his dignity was sorely hurt by thus being made a draft animal, he was too wise to rebel. He buckled down with a will and did his best, though it was all new and strange. François was stern, demanding instant obedience, and by virtue of his whip receiving instant obedience; while Dave, who was an experienced wheeler, nipped Buck's hindquarters whenever he was in error. Spitz was the leader, likewise experienced, and though he could not always get at Buck, he growled sharp reproof now and again, or cunningly threw his weight in the traces to jerk Buck into the way he should go. Buck learned easily, and under the combined tuition of his two mates and François made remarkable progress. Ere they returned to camp he knew enough to stop at "ho!" to go ahead at "mush!" to swing wide on the bends, and to keep clear of the wheeler when the loaded sled shot down-hill at their heels.

"T'ree vair' good dogs," François told Perrault. "Dat Buck, heem pool lak h—l. I tich heem queek as anyt'ing."

By afternoon, Perrault, who was in a hurry to be on the trail with his dispatches, returned with two more dogs. "Billee" and "Jo," he called them, two brothers, and true huskies both. Sons of the one mother though they were, they were as different as day and night. Billee's one fault was his excessive good nature, whereas Jo was the very opposite, sour and introspective, with a perpetual snarl and a malignant eye. Buck received them in comradely fashion; Dave ignored them; while Spitz proceeded to thrash first one and then the other. Billee wagged his tail appeasingly, turned to run when he saw that appeasement was of no avail, and cried (still appeasingly) when Spitz's sharp teeth scored his flank. But no matter how Spitz circled, Jo whirled around on his heels to face him, mane bristling, ears laid back, lips writhing and snarling, jaws clipping together as fast as he could snap, and eyes diabolically gleaming—the incarnation of belligerent fear. So terrible was his appearance that Spitz was forced to forego disciplining him; but to cover his own discomfiture he turned upon the inoffensive and wailing Billee and drove him to the confines of the camp.

By evening Perrault secured another dog, an old husky, long and lean and gaunt, with a battle-scarred face and a single eye which flashed a warning of prowess that commanded respect. He was called Sol-leks, which means the Angry One. Like Dave, he asked nothing, gave nothing, expected nothing, and when he marched slowly and deliberately into their midst even Spitz left him alone. He had one peculiarity which Buck was unlucky enough to discover. He did not like to be approached on his blind side. Of this offense Buck was unwittingly guilty, and the first knowledge he had of his indiscretion was when Sol-leks whirled upon him and slashed his shoulder to the bone for three inches up and down. Forever after Buck avoided his blind side, and to the last of their comradeship had no more trouble. His only apparent ambition, like Dave's, was to be left alone; though, as Buck was afterward to learn, each of them possessed one other and far more vital ambition.

That night Buck faced the great problem of sleeping. The tent, illumined by a candle, glowed warmly in the midst of the white plain; and when he, as a matter of course, entered it, both Perrault and François bombarded him with curses and cooking utensils, till he recovered from his consternation and fled ignominiously into the outer cold. A chill wind was blowing that nipped him sharply and bit with especial venom into his wounded shoulder. He lay down on the snow and attempted to sleep, but the frost soon drove him shivering to his feet. Miserable and disconsolate, he wandered about among the many tents, only to find that one place was as cold as another. Here and there savage dogs rushed upon him, but he bristled his neck-hair and snarled (for he was learning fast) and they let him go his way unmolested.

Finally an idea came to him. He would return and see how his own team-mates were making out. To his astonishment they had disappeared. Again he wandered about through the great camp, looking for them, and again he returned. Were they in the tent? No, that could not be, else he would not have been driven out. Then where could they possibly be? With drooping tail and shivering body, very forlorn indeed, he aimlessly circled the tent. Suddenly the snow gave way beneath his forelegs and he sank down. Something wriggled under his feet. He sprang back, bristling and snarling, fearful of the unseen and unknown. But a friendly little yelp reassured him, and he went back to investigate. A whiff of warm air ascended to his nostrils, and there, curled up under the snow in a snug ball, lay Billee. He whined placatingly, squirmed and wriggled to show his good will and intentions, and even ventured, as a bribe for peace, to lick Buck's face with his warm, wet tongue.

Another lesson. So that was the way they did it, eh? Buck confidently selected a spot, and with much fuss and waste effort proceeded to dig a hole for himself. In a trice the heat from his body filled the confined space and he was asleep. The day had been long and arduous, and he slept soundly and comfortably, though he growled and barked and wrestled with bad dreams.

Nor did he open his eyes till roused by the noises of the waking camp. At first he did not know where he was. It had snowed during the night and he was completely buried. The snow-walls pressed him on every side, and a great surge of fear swept through him—the fear of the wild thing for the trap, a token that he was harking back through his own life to the lives of his forebears; for he was a civilized dog, an unduly civilized dog, and of his own experience knew no trap and so could not of himself fear it. The muscles of his whole body contracted spasmodically and instinctively, the hair on his neck and shoulders stood on end, and with a ferocious snarl he bounded straight up into the blinding day, the snow flying about him in a flashing cloud. Ere he landed on his feet he saw the white camp spread out before him and knew where he was, and remembered all that had passed from the time he went for a stroll with Manuel to the hole he had dug for himself the night before.

A shout from François hailed his appearance. "Wot I say?" the dog-driver cried to Perrault. "Dat Buck for sure learn queek as anyt'ing."

Perrault nodded gravely. As courier for the Canadian Government, bearing important dispatches, he was anxious to secure the best dogs, and he was particularly gladdened by the possession of Buck.

Three more huskies were added to the team inside of an hour, making a total of nine, and before another quarter of an hour had passed they were in harness and swinging up the trail toward the Dyea Cañon. Buck was glad to be gone, and though the work was hard he found he did not particularly despise it. He was surprised at the eagerness which animated the whole team and which was communicated to him; but still more surprising was the change wrought in Dave and Sol-leks. They were new dogs, utterly transformed by the harness. All passiveness and unconcern had dropped from them. They were alert and active, anxious that the work should go well, and fiercely irritable with whatever, by delay or confusion, retarded that work. The toil of the traces seemed the supreme expression of their being, and all that they lived for and the only thing in which they took delight.

Dave was wheeler or sled dog, pulling in front of him was Buck, then came Sol-leks; the rest of the team was strung out ahead, single file, to the leader, which position was filled by Spitz.

Buck had been purposely placed between Dave and Sol-leks so that he might receive instruction. Apt scholar that he was, they were equally apt teachers, never allowing him to linger long in error and enforcing their teaching with their sharp teeth. Dave was fair, and very wise. He never nipped Buck without cause, and he never failed to nip him when he stood in need of it. As François' whip backed him up, Buck found it to be cheaper to mend his ways than to retaliate. Once, during a brief halt, when he got tangled in the traces and delayed the start, both Dave and Sol-leks flew at him and administered a sound trouncing. The resulting tangle was even worse, but Buck took good care to keep the traces clear thereafter. And ere the day was done, so well had he mastered his work his mates about ceased nagging him.

STRAIGHT AT THE MAN HE LAUNCHED

The People at Atlantic City

ATLANTIC CITY has long since ceased to be a "Jersey summer place." And it is more than a mere all-the-year-round seaside resort. It has now become a sort of national institution, as Brighton is to England, visited by all sorts of people from all parts of our country and by the more thoroughgoing tourists from other countries —one of the American sights.

But the perennial popularity of this flat, commonplace strip of sandbar cannot be explained by the salubrious climate, the surf-bathing or any natural attraction. The thing which draws the crowds of people in winter and the hordes of humanity in summer to Atlantic City, and supplies most of their fun after they get there, is the great, ugly, flimsy-looking platform edging the beach for nearly four miles, with innumerable hotels, bazars and blaring side-shows on one hand and the Atlantic Ocean on the other.

The advertising and rhapsodizing "write-ups" always take pains to explain that the Gulf Stream considerately swerves in closer to shore off Atlantic City than at any other point north of South Carolina. Very likely it does, but a few degrees difference in temperature would not account for the number of hotels that turned away people during the month of March last, most of whom were not there for their health. On the other hand, as a summer resort the beach is not the best along the coast for bathing, though a good one; and the heat and the mosquitoes and the glare of the flat sandiness are about as bad as at most of the Atlantic coast resorts below New England. As for natural beauty there is none, except the same charm of the surf and sea which this spot shares with a thousand others.

Nor is it discriminating to sum the matter up, cynically, as "a mere product of advertising." You can't fool all the people all the time. You must have a good thing in order to push it along to a great success like this. A great many of the people induced to come to Atlantic must like it, because see how they come back, bringing others, an hundredfold. Presumably their motive is not to find bargains in Satsuma vases at Japanese auction bazars which have to make money enough in a few months to pay an enormous rent; nor would many people come so far away from home in order to see plays at a theatre built out upon a pier in the ocean, or to hear Italian bands, or to attend polite and impolite vaudeville.

The reason the people like Atlantic City is because, with or without the attractions of other places, it has this great central promenade, which is not merely a main route to and from everything of interest and importance, but is itself the most important source of interest. And the simple reason it proves so entertaining to so many people is because (though there are many who affect to be more charmed nowadays by the "characteristic poses of the owlet" and the manners and customs of the dear little bunny than by that diverting form of animal life called man) the good old human fact remains that to most unaffected human beings, whatever their station in life, there are few things quite so interesting as other humans—except possibly themselves. This huge platform is a stage for displaying the characteristic poses of the one and observing the manners and customs of the other. All the audience are actors, and all the actors —with an occasional self-conscious exception—are the audience. The shrewd boomers of this resort who insisted upon spending a great many dollars upon the boardwalk wanted to call it a "plaisance," an "esplanade," or at least "a marine promenade"—it had cost such a dignified amount of money. But even though it was supported by a steel frame, the American crowd had too keen a sense of the ridiculous to call a stretch of raw planking, lined with bare electric-light poles, anything but a "boardwalk." But however the managers may have lacked in a sense of humor, they did not lack in business sense. They knew human nature and they knew their job. What draws the crowd to Atlantic City is the crowd, and the boardwalk is its medium. The ocean and the ozone on the right, like the manufactured attractions on the left, are but sideshows.

The Two Kinds of Atlantic City

THE two kinds of Atlantic City are as different as Doctor Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, or as summer and winter. In the glaring summer-time, with the excursion crowds from Philadelphia and cheap rates from all parts of the country, when the best parts of the beach are so crowded that those in the surf have to stand erect and the boardwalk all day long and half the night is jammed like the entrance to a race-course, Atlantic City suggests Coney Island. The roar of the surf is drowned out by the chatter and laughter of sweltering, pushing humanity. Bands are crashing, fakirs shouting, tired babies crying, merry-go-rounds whirling, shooting-galleries plinking. There are flashy youths leering and gaudy young women giggling. Honest fathers mopping their brows and smoking hot cigars, patient mothers yanking their offspring out of danger; the smell of candy, popcorn, bad tobacco and, worse, Eastern incense in the air; and above all the August sun beating down pitilessly upon the sturdy American crowd who are having a glorious time and do not want your pity.

In the winter season the crowd is more like that of a Florida resort. They walk faster, though, and the women wear their furs, which a crisp sea breeze blows about them picturesquely. Furs mingled with the scent of violets make the characteristic odor now of a very respectable Atlantic City. There aren't nearly so many people; there is plenty of open space also to smell the sea, which makes walkers out of strollers. Compared to the summer scene the stage is very quiet and the actors are not so spontaneous in their movements nor in their stage business. A great part of the people along the boardwalk are of the sort generically classified by the hotel managers as "fashionable folk." Every year there is a growing number of those who consider themselves worthy of this classification, especially that part of the crowd which comes from the direction of Chelsea, where many new and more or less good-looking cottages are being built. But even now there is a goodly sprinkling of the ingenuous Coney Island sort, or at the least, we will say, a Brighton Beach element. For surely the commoner clay cannot be expected to escape such common ailments as influenza and nervous breakdowns.

So, naturally, if you are interested only in your own segment of society you may be bothered by the crowds along the walk, for it contains all sorts. Seated in the characteristic wheel-chair, strolling aimlessly, or marching industriously as the nerve specialists told them they should do, are lawyers who want to get away from their work in order to see it in perspective, politicians who are here to meet other politicians and arrange things, members of saloon-keepers' associations, of library associations, of athletic committees; lovers, fiancés, brides and grooms, the heroine and villain of the current divorce sensation, here to escape reporters. Contented corpulent couples of middle age are here to become more corpulent and contented; real estate speculators and promoters, sailor-suited children and nursemaids —a variegated assemblage, and they all go up and down the boardwalk.

At the edge of the walk in front of a bazar is an aged East Indian with a turban on his head and the mystery of the Orient in his calm, inscrutable countenance. He is offering embroidery for sale, but I should like to know what he thinks about all this. Perhaps he is merely thinking about his dinner—very possibly, for the walk gives one an excellent appetite, which is one of the chief reasons for Atlantic City's reputation as a health resort.

These auction shops are the most interesting sideshows along the walk, and are splendid places to stop and rest; for the hard, level planking is very fatiguing. Within there are a score of visitors seated solemnly in chairs, arranged like a Bible-class. Before them stands a big man with a double chin and the unctuous auctioneer's earnestness of manner, hiding his contempt for human gullibility. In his fat palm he holds a delicate bit of cloisonné, rich with the witchery of Japanese handicraft. He bellows about it in his huge voice, calling it the "most unique" work of art on the boardwalk.

This is a china shop and he looks like a bull, standing there beside the small, delicately-moulded Jap who owns the shop and whose thin features almost tremble at the auctioneer's blatant ignorance. The Jap, it seems, cannot stand it any longer—even their merchants have temperament—for he takes the vase from the other's rough hand and begins to explain in charming broken English how it was made and why it is precious. His voice is thin and does not carry to the open door, but he handles the vase, which is really a good one, as if it were a butterfly. He speaks with affectionate appreciation. But the people are not so much interested in this technical dissertation. Already some of them are leaving. The big auctioneer sees this. He breaks in with vehemence. "The trouble with you people is that you don't know anything about art, that's what's the matter with you!" Some of them smile. "Reminds me of an old farmer down in my part of the country. One day he said to his son Tom: 'Tom,' says he——" Ah, the crowd lingers, listens, then laughs, and the bidding begins. After all, there are other arts than the ones the Jap understands, and the auctioneer is not such a bull in this china shop as he looks.

Out along the walk again. Here come some very nice people, two girls and their mother. The distinguished-looking matron is a semi-invalid, or thinks she is, having nothing else in particular to do, and her handsome daughters are so very good to her. They seem gently disdainful of everything else. We who think we love all mankind because they are mankind tell ourselves that this group is interesting because they are a variation from most of the people that we have been passing. They are indeed a marked variation. But perhaps, after all, we might as well acknowledge that civilization has produced nothing quite so interesting to look at as such products as these two tall girls with the elusive charm, which one does not try to catch in words, and which distracts the attention from all these ordinary persons who we had persuaded ourselves were also interesting. They have turned back to the hotel again—no, they have gone out to find a sunny nook on the steel pier where they will take turns reading to their mother, and where they can avoid the crowd—which includes us. The pier is an interesting place and has as many shaded nooks in summer as it has sunny corners in the winter season. One hot day in August two thousand persons played progressive euchre at once in the auditorium. The players did not know each other, but that did not seem to matter. The entrance fees were for some local charity and the prizes were probably vases from the boardwalk bazars. This is one way of enjoying yourself on a hot summer afternoon.

Here are two other young women. The crowd does not seem to bore them. They are shop girls from the city, off for a holiday. They are dressed in their new spring clothes and are having the time of their life. Look at their exaggerated hats, coiffures, figures and carriage. They are comely girls, and it is good to be admired as they know themselves to be to-day. There they go, their long skirts whisking in the brisk spring breeze, showing their very high French heels and an inch or two of ankle. "'Atlantic' is good enough for us," they seem to say.

Here is a young lawyer who walks with a deliberate stride and darts a keen glance out from under the big slouch hat he affects. The reason he looks so tragic is that he thinks he has had the greatest misfortune of any one along the boardwalk. Just when he was getting well started, when at last he had the political chance for which he had been working ever since he left college, along came the grip and put him out of the game. For the grip was followed by nerves, and now he is paying the piper for all the extra hours of work he used to boast about to the family at dinner. He must stay here for two months more, the physician says, and do nothing but eat and sleep and live out-of-doors. His mother visits him frequently to hold his hand and tell him what a fine fellow he is. His father writes him brief letters urging him to go abroad. And he thinks his career is blighted. However, being young, he appreciates the crowd and the color and the life about him more than he acknowledges. Sometimes he even takes notice of a pretty figure and forgets to scowl. He is not very pathetic.

The Floating Population of the Town

ATLANTIC CITY now has three or four hundred hotels and no one seems to know how many boarding-houses besides. Its summer population—"floating" population, as an English encyclopædia puts it—is said to be 200,000. What impresses one most of all on arriving, after the monotonous journey through the dreary waste of stunted pines and across the barren stretch of mosquito-breeding swamp, at this strip of island which was designed as a sand-bar, is the thought that Atlantic City might just as well have happened on almost any other sand-bar. At any rate, it might as well have landed upon some other part of this ten-mile stretch of beach. Longport, which is at the southern end of it, would seem in many ways to have been a better place; certainly it would have offered superior advantages for sailing and kindred sports, and presumably the Gulf Stream would have proved equally accessible. But it has made a great deal of difference to the men who have sold strips of this sand at $1000 a front foot unimproved. The man in the white hat with the yellow beard, who sells cream taffy from a little stand about the size of a flagman's box at a railway crossing, pays $600 a year rent for the space he occupies—$100 a front foot. He built the box himself.

Twenty-nine years ago a man came to Atlantic City and bought a small commercial hotel of the roadhouse pattern for $6200. This was in the village, not on the beach. On the day I arrived at Atlantic City, last March, he sold it for $300,000. Meanwhile he had made a fortune out of the business, and the only reason he sold the place was because he was so heavily interested in the local telephone, brewery, trolley and banking businesses that he hadn't any more time to spend on running hotels.

Across the street, by the way, from this hotel a small piece of property was sold five years ago for $37,000. The natives smiled and pronounced the purchaser weak-minded. He sold it the other day for $125,000. It cannot be stated what the natives think of this transaction, but more experienced real estate men pronounce it shrewd business.

Both of these deals were in the middle of the town near one of the railway stations. Along the boardwalk more astonishing things have been done. Not so many years ago one of the bronzed, bare-legged young men who are employed to sit on the sand and look out for people who go beyond their depth and strength in the water, announced to one of the other lifesavers that he was tired of yawning and waiting for something to happen. He said he thought he would go into business.

"What do you know about business?" asked the other.

"I am young; I can learn," he said.

He had saved a little money and borrowed some more. He set up a merry-go-round. It was of modest dimensions and the music was wheezy. The first year was not so successful. "But every summer there are more people," he argued. He invested in a larger outfit, with fiery red horses with long spreading tails, and he secured a loud, strident musical appliance which played Sousa's marches all day long without oiling. He also added a bootblacking chair and a candy stand. The crowds kept increasing annually. So did his facilities. To-day he owns a great pier with chutes that many shoot, a theatre, a music hall, a restaurant, and a deep-sea net which is hauled up twice a day and is one of the greatest attractions of all. "He makes a fortune every year," a man along the boardwalk proudly informed me, who had made a fortune or two of his own through real estate ventures at Atlantic City. The pier man's summer home may be seen out near the end of his pier, where mosquitoes cannot reach him—quite the most desirable situation in Atlantic City, I should think, though I was informed that he is the proud possessor of another house over in Chelsea where he can have room for his horses and his family's aspirations!

But much of the money made at Atlantic City has not been due to acuteness at all, but to mere luck and the shifting of the sands. The early maps show that in some places fifty years ago the shore line was twelve hundred feet farther out. If it had stayed there, property now worth ever so much would be remotely inland. This thing, however, works both ways. Some of the landed proprietors have had the peaceful pleasure of watching the sea build them a fortune by extending their domain toward Spain, while others have had the disquieting sensation of seeing their real estate taken away under their very eyes by the sea. In most cases this can be avoided by the building of jetties, for which the otherwise useless scrub pines on the mainland serve the purpose excellently.

How Atlantic was First Heard Of ATTENTION was first called to Atlantic City as a watering-place, I believe, by the competition of two railroads. But it was not until years later that it was considered a dangerous rival to Cape May. When those interested in the booming of the place began to take the project seriously the first and the best thing they did was to invite all the prominent physicians they could get hold of to be their guests at Atlantic City for a brilliant visit which lasted several days. The same method has been applied with similar success elsewhere. All expenses were paid, they were entertained lavishly, made to see everything, to breathe the air deeply, to test the temperature, taste the water, inspect the milk, and finally to eat a banquet. Then they were asked what they thought of Atlantic City. By this time even those who were skeptical at first thought well of it.

"Then tell your patients what you honestly think," was the more or less naive reply, and most of these physicians have been sending people to Atlantic City ever since. But this was legitimate advertising and is nothing to wax cynical about. Very few of these physicians would have recommended the place if they had not believed in it. But how could they believe in it without seeing?

As a matter of fact and science, Atlantic City does prove beneficial to a great many different sorts of people from various parts of the country, suffering or recovering from divers complaints. It is not alone the climate that does it, let me add, who have no license to prescribe; the benefit received is in a large measure due to watching and walking with the crowd along the boardwalk. And the great future which is being predicted for this unusual place will not be due to new inventions for amusements. The crowd will increase because of the crowds. For people are the best tonic, the best fun and the best advertisement a resort can get.

Personally Conducted

Being a Romance of True Love Without any Apology

By Arthur E. McFarlane

AT THE beginning everything had promised well. Mrs. Morris had always wanted to try a season with the "Steel City" people at the Fishing Club. And Portia, fresh from her year on the Continent, turned her eyes to the cool woods and waters of Quebec most gladly. And when they arrived at Pickerel Lake, and viewed the grass-green and bark-brown verandas, and the pepper-caster turrets of The Cedars—fourth cottage up the river from the club-house—they admitted at once that the Judge's enthusiasm seemed to have had the very best of foundations.

He repeated his belief that the Preserve would not disappoint them. Also, with an accompanying ahem which was casual, and a furtive stealthiness of eye which was not casual, he remarked that Percy Johnston happened to be staying at the club just then—Portia would remember Percy; they must frequently have mentioned him in their letters; a mighty straight, clean-cut sort, about as good a head as he knew among the juniors of the profession.

A few minutes later Mr. Johnston appeared in person and was duly presented. He was a nippy, wholesome-looking young fellow, with a close-clipped black mustache and a self-dependent blockiness of jaw which was balanced and relieved by a cheerful frivolousness about the eyes. If the spring-board of his somewhat acrobatically leaping mind appeared to have a good deal of "teeter" in it, it was safe to say that that was only because it was uncommonly well ballasted. And Portia would like him—it could not be doubted.

I say all that was well. The initial and grounded mistake—the stem-root of that prodigious banyan-tree of error which soon was to transform everything to tangled wilderness and jungle—was this: The Judge did not now betake himself up the river and join the old "stag" trio of the Little Pickerel, but announced that he would stay on for another week or two at The Cedars.

Mrs. Morris' most apprehensive suspicions were aroused immediately—and too promptly were they confirmed. Before the end of the first afternoon she heard the old gentleman telling the bronzy-cheeked Percy that he would look largely to him to see that his girl enjoyed herself. And Miss Portia, having slipped away with no little color, he furthermore confided to Mr. Johnston (who did not seem to be quite at his ease, himself, now) that Portia was a trifle prickly, as it were, at times—did herself harm—got herself misjudged by it, in fact; and in certain respects she had rather got away from him; but take her altogether, he was compelled to say she was a girl any father might be proud of.

Mrs. Morris felt the hot and cold waves of a whole year's weather records going through her. She resolved to talk to her infatuated yoke-fellow, and pointedly, at the first opportunity. And she did.

At first the Judge took very high ground. He was utterly at a loss to guess what her meaning was.

She made it unpleasantly plainer.

And then he swelled with indignation. "Really, my dear, really! This is rather extraordinary. You virtually ask me to change my manner toward the boy—because Portia happens to be here. After having taken to him immensely from the first hour I met him, I am to reverse myself to him, now!"

"You could at least be a little discreet."

"'Discreet!'" He spread his fat hands spurningly. "If there was ever a word over which was the trail of the serpent ——"

"Well, merely tactful, then."

"Which means practically the same thing! Flatly, what you ask me to do is to dissemble. And I must say you show hardly your accustomed delicacy and good taste."

"Very well, Isaac," said Mrs. Morris, snapping off her thread—"if you choose not to take good advice——"

PERCY dropped in almost immediately after breakfast next morning. The Judge still comported himself somewhat stiffly toward him, but the young man was most happily and flippantly unaware of the cause of it.

"DON'T SPEAK TO ME"

"Judge seems rather sore, somehow, to-day," he observed in a loud, though confidential, aside to Mrs. Morris. "He probably told you he spent all yesterday afternoon rowing up and down in the sun off Alder Point. But he can prove he wasn't trolling—because he didn't catch anything. I may say, in passing, that I caught four."

He glanced at the old gentleman from under a covert eyelid. In spite of himself the Judge responded with a sheepish grin.

"Oh, he may grow up into a fisherman yet," added Percy comfortingly. "Is—is Miss Morris down yet?"

"She's just run back to her room for a moment. Were you going out together?"

"Oh, only up to the Mouth. The Judge said I ought to have the pleasure of showing her how to hook out the foxy pickerel."

The Judge stood there for a minute. Then, with the dignity which so distinguished him at such moments, he walked back into his study.

And when, upon the departure of the young people, Mrs. Morris promptly followed him thither, it may be thought that he would show some disturbance of temper. By no means. He put the trifling pickerel-fishing incident aside and lifted the whole matter to the lofty plane of ethical principle. It was an ancient game of his.

"Let us have no more beating about the bush, Elizabeth," he said Socratically. "Womanlike, you have neither been able to bring yourself nor allow me to face this thing squarely and openly. But the question is frankly this: Do we think it would be a good thing for Portia to have Percy?"

"Yes, we do! I know he's good and honest, and just what I could have wished a son of mine to be. But that isn't considering Portia's side of it. I remember very well how I looked at such matters when I was her age, and——"

"Precisely! Precisely! And do you candidly believe that Portia or any other green girl can have the wisdom and experience to recognize the right man for herself? I confess that it has seemed to me, of late, that Percy himself has not been acting with his usual intelligence. But we shall confine the case wholly to Portia."

"We-ell," said her mother, with something palpably short of that impetuous blindness which should mark the true maternal character, "for all her cleverness and good heart, at times I think the girl has not the best of sense in some ways. But nevertheless"—there was a baffled exasperation in her tone—"I know I'm in the right. And I think she ought to be allowed to have her own share of romance."

"Well, bless me!" sputtered the Judge—"'Romance?' What more romance could she want, up here in the very bosom of Nature, as they say."

"Tchck! That romance?"

"Then, will you tell me, woman, what in the world you consider does make for romance?"

"Well," said Mrs. Morris with scornful crispness, "if you can't feel what it is, I can't make you! I think, before long, you'll find out, though. And I'll say this: it isn't anything which can be improved by being pawed over by fathers who ought to know a great deal better!"

At which most unwifely and insulting language the Judge grasped his panama and fishing-rod and rushed apoplectically from the cottage. . . .

It might very well be supposed, too, that it would be some time before he again essayed the rôle of paternal strategist. And indeed he did not descend from a kind of gloomy and penumbrated Olympus until well on to the end of that week. He avoided Percy more and more, and there were even moments when he viewed his ever-doubling visits almost cankerously.

In the mean time, between the young people the "friendship of the first degree" was rapidly passing—by way of the philosophical stage—into the "friendship of the second." By the philosophical stage I mean that in those evenings they had already fallen into the discussion of the strange phenomena of the reciprocation of souls—of how, almost at the first word, certain spirits will seem to recognize each other as kindred, intimate, foreordained to union. Nor was there anything callowly personal, nor anything of the "affinity" fatuousness in that discussion. They had treated the subject in the most aloof and sublimated manner. But is any deprecation called for? Is it not well known that the greatest metaphysicians have wondered for years over this mystery—over the fact, I repeat, that two people will meet, and not only seem to have met in some other life, but have the common feeling that they comprehend each other wholly in the first half-hour? Mr. Johnston had early realized that he was a youth absolutely without sentimentality. But the recollection of that first conversation had kept him hypnotically glued to a riverside log long after the general camp, though not Miss Portia, was wrapped in heavy slumber.

For all that, neither of them could be blind to the peculiar behavior of the Judge. And indeed, even in that "philosophical stage" Miss Portia had thoughts regarding his conduct which, could he have guessed them, would have given him very sudden pause! . . .

As for Percy, he had privately believed, for some time, that there "was something the matter with the old gentleman's inside."

III

BUT gradually the Judge was once more warming to his old-time, genial effusiveness. That Friday morning Percy had dropped down from the clubhouse in time to be received over the coffee cups. The head of the table had promised to go for a loaf around the Lake with him in his "batwing"; but now he crawfished shamelessly out of it. "But, Portia there—she was pretending to have a headache—but he was sure—if he would let her 'trim boat' for him instead—she would be a good girl and take his place—he knew she would!"

At this suggestion Percy was plainly, almost impoliticly, delighted. But the young lady, while she accepted, let her eyes meet her mother's for a moment; and, although only a silence accompanied that look, it was an incident which again set the Judge's soul chafing with anger. When they were alone, too, Mrs. Morris could not—for possibly the seventeenth time that week—withhold the "words which might better have been left unsaid." . . . It was a heavy, sultry day, promising a thunderstorm.

Nor did Mr. Percy have a particularly happy morning of it. Miss Portia's manner was such that he would have been a very wayfaring young man indeed could he have erred therein. Not that it was uncivil at all; it was ladylike to the loftiest and most punctilious degree. But she seemed suddenly to have grown very "old and superior," and to be compelled, however unpleasant the duty might be, to remind him of the essential brevity of their acquaintance!

As the batwing settled somnolently to her work in the light airs, he again attempted to lead the talk back and up to the "high philosophic meads" where once more they might cull for each other the flowerets of their most transcendental meditations. But now the damsel seemed to have no mind for that whatever. She drew only the farther away from him. And when at last they had made the circuit of the Lake, she thanked him dismissingly at the boathouse, and walked swiftly home alone.

He went up to the club, played a game of fifteen-ball pool to clear his head—which did not clear it at all—listened to a lot of idiotic roasting from the other cue-holders, and finally, being an optimist and a materialist, he persuaded himself that she would probably be feeling somewhat different after luncheon. At any rate he would run over to The Cedars and see.

Now, over at The Cedars, Miss Portia had entered only to mount directly to her room. And when at luncheon the Judge had for five minutes drummed on the table and glowered at the hall stairs, Mrs. Morris rose and went up to seek the girl.

She was stretched out on her pink silk comforter, and it was ruinously watermarked by a very spring-tide of woe.

"Mother," she cried, "why does father want to make such—such a perfect fool of me? One would think I wasn't ten years old! I know he just wants—wants Mr. Johnston—to act that way toward me—treating me as he does before him! I—I thought—thought at first that I was going to like him—but now, I'm—just—just beginning to loathe—loathe him!"

By the time luncheon should have been over Mrs. Morris descended, and she descended alone.

"Well," rasped the Judge from a gnawingly empty stomach—when the placid Helga had retired for the fish—"what ails the girl, pray?"

Mrs. Morris thrust away her plate. "Oh, it's exactly as I anticipated. Instead of helping her affairs by your—your unteachable folly, it's a chance now if you haven't spoiled everything!"

The Judge's eyes began to bulge like a crab's.

"And can't you understand the exasperation a girl, or anybody—feels at being managed—at having some one else forever making her arrangements—at having her courtship 'personally conducted,' you might call it?"

"Elizabeth——"

"To say nothing of the absolute—yes, the absolute vulgarity of being thrown at him! I'm just sick of the whole thing!"

"And do you think I'm anything but sick of it? I'm sick of her—yes, and of him, too! Two weeks ago I could take a little different view of him, but as it is now—if he comes around here again——"

The expression of horror on the face of his helpmeet stopped him. He jerked his chair to the right about. The young man himself was standing at the door. He was flamingly red and coughing a warning cough that would not have passed in amateur theatricals. (It had brought Miss Portia to the head of the stairs, however!)

"I—I thought I'd just drop in. There was to be a picnic—I thought I'd remind you——"

"I—I THOUGHT I'D JUST DROP IN"

There was good reason now for the Judge to effuse all warmth and cordiality. Alas! far from it. His fury at being overheard immediately blew off at the victim for overhearing him! "'Picnic?' Whose picnic? I suggested no picnic! I know nothing of any picnic, and I care infinitely less!"

"Isaac!"

"I'll have no more, now! I tell you there's been about as much of this as—as—I'll simply have no more to say to him whatever!" He flung down his napkin and started outdoors. "You may talk to him yourself, if you desire to!"

"Father!" cried the agonized Portia, and rushing downstairs, started after his shamelessly retreating figure.

But Mr. Johnston, with a face like an impressionist's setting sun, was already rapidly taking the other direction. She turned and flew after him.

"Oh, what must you think?" She caught wildly at his arm. "And after me being such a perfect little beast all morning, too! And you doing everything you could to be nice to me! Where is the picnic? I'll go with you! And if you'll only show me how else I can make it up to you——!"

. . . . . .

At dinner it was the Judge who was somewhat late. Portia met him wearing an expression as wholly new and as fascinatingly uncanny as if she had just been tattooed. "I—I think it right to tell you, father," she said in a voice half of martyrdom, half of burning challenge, "that I've been out with Mr. Johnston all afternoon, and—if I think it can give him any pleasure—I am going out with him again tomorrow!"

The old gentleman gasped and swallowed. And between courses he gasped and swallowed again. As he had acknowledged to Mr. Percy himself, "in some ways Portia had rather got away from him." He was now overwhelmingly convinced of that.

But could he understand the baleful character which at one leap she had ascribed to him? Or could he guess how, that night, with further fiery tears, she had laid upon herself the sacred duty of retrieving the family dignity—by him so flagrantly flung away!

IV

THROUGHOUT the preposterous days which followed the reflections and emotions of the ferocious young-man-hater of The Cedars were extraordinarily complicated. And so many of them were of varieties as yet unnamed and unclassified by even the German psychologists that the present teller-of-truth—though having the most exhaustive comprehension of the old gentleman's kaleidoscopic state of mind himself—feels the utter impossibility of interpreting it to you, dear reader of this brief and tender idyl.

Perhaps, however, if you have ever set forth to lead some blithe and innocent young animal—make it, if you will, a filly of the richest Arabian strain—and suddenly at the very hilliest and most treacherous part of the road the charming young creature has picked up her precious heels and elected to lead you, with no apparent likelihood of tiring, either—you will be in some position to grasp the essential conditions of the situation. Suffice it to say that the Judge still had occasional nicotian half-hours when he could tell himself that he regarded this new and violent adjustment of the affair with tranquillity. But for the most part he was entirely illogical; he distinctly and unmistakably did not like it!

In the mean time Miss Portia, feeling that in Mr. Johnston there was the poignant aftermath of what is legally specified as "great anguish of mind," rested not in seeking new ways of bringing him solace. She did not now cruelly refuse to return to those high Elysian meadows of the "perfect sympathy." It was she, now, who unblushingly led him up and into them. And not only did she twine with him the amaranth of the "kindred soul," but it might almost have been said that she hung wreaths of it about his afflicted neck. All of which, in the hours when he could forget the "outside situation," was ambrosially sweet to him.

He was on a very Magic Carpet, indeed. One morning he had confessed to an unmanly fondness for gingerbread. In the afternoon Miss Portia came out to him with a whole batch of it. The day following he happened to lament the loss of a Tam o'Shanter he had been wont to wear when sailing. That evening she produced one she had had in the Baltic, and would hear of no refusal!

Nor in the mean time had her righteous animus against her ruthless father undergone any perceptible amelioration. At almost any meal, now, she gave him conscientiously to know that she had either just come from an excursion with Mr. Johnston or had one in contemplation. And that grated on the Judge excessively.

To complete all, the camp at large, too, was now observing the progress of Portia's affair; and, although in the very kindest way, of course, was beginning to remark upon it. This did not make for happiness, and as the week went on the comments redoubled. Nor must any one suppose that Miss Portia herself was ignorant of them. But she set her lips together in a fierceness of pride, and breathed through fanning nostrils, which she held so high that the world was beneath her notice.

Indeed, the one thing which did have power to embitter her was the ingratitude of Mr. Percy himself. For, as the days passed, in spite of all she was doing to make his outcast lot delectable, she could have sworn that he had been happier, all in all, when enduring the brutalities of her outrageous parent! He kept asking her concernedly about the old gentleman's health, and repeatedly suggested that he call for her at the cottage. And when Saturday evening came, it was as if he had taken an oath to see himself completely outdone before the new week began! "I just want to try to straighten things out," he said, "for I'm ready to stack up everything I have that it was just some fool misunderstanding. I want to try to get right with him."

"Well, after the way you were insulted, if it's anybody's place to make the advances——"

"Oh, no, now, it isn't! He's twice my age—and I've never really had half enough practice in that sort of thing. I remember now the way I'd been rubbing it into him about his fishing."

"For my part, I'd made up my mind that I'd never let you come to our place again!"

"But I want to! It's a case of playing in your yard, don't you see? And—while I know just how generously you mean in the matter—in me it seems just a little low-down and underhand, you know!"

"Oh, of course, if you look at it in that way—if you are willing to be insulted again——" Somehow at that moment his magnanimity seemed to her only a glancing reflection upon herself. She cut short their after-dinner paddle, had him turn down the river homeward. And when she started back along the path to The Cedars it was with a heart vaguely but achingly angry at Mr. Johnston, her father, and all the world beside. . . .

The Judge had endured one week of the new order of things; but in that after-dinner hour of Saturday, as he sat smoking by Mrs. Morris on their riverward grass-plot, he was telling himself irrevocably that it had now gone on quite long enough. He would give Percy one more chance. He would go down to the club that night and tell him to come up and join them in a rubber of whist. And if—after all he had stood from him—he should refuse—yes—or even for one moment hesitate——

It was almost at this moment that Percy's canoe, with Portia in the bow of it, passed them on its way back to the boathouse!

At the sight, Mrs. Morris dropped the cushion-top she had been embroidering. "Isaac, I haven't said much this last week—I've been silent even to her—but I want to know how long you are going to allow this thing to go on?"

"It shall go on no longer," he replied in a voice of finality; "I've decided to end it to-night."

She turned and looked at him, and with all the apprehensive suspicion of three weeks ago. "Well, I should very much like to know how, then?"

The Masquerading Cynic

The Story of a Courtship by Proxy

By Hamblen Sears

THE Naugatuck Club was unique. It was only four hours from town, its maximum membership was twenty-five, politics, business and bridge were tabooed. Anybody caught discussing politics was fined ten dollars. Talking business or putting a deal through cost a member three months' suspension. A discovered game of bridge meant expulsion for all concerned.

A well-built young man of about thirty sat by the big wood fire in the huge room of the club with that placidity which the first day with the wild ducks gives to a tired man.

The wheels of the station buckboard sounded outside, the door opened and another man, perhaps a little less vigorous, perhaps not quite so strong in face and body, walked in.

"Halloa, Dick," said he.

"Halloa, Freddie, what brings you into the wilds?"

"I'm done up, Dick! I can't reach it! I—come up to my room, will you? I've got to talk to somebody."

A moment later, one sitting on the bed, the other unpacking, Freddie said:

"Richard, I'm useless!"

"No more than usual, I hope," said the other politely.

"Well, I just pass! I'm dead to the world!"

"If you would talk the English language I might gather the context," suggested Richard.

"Look here, Dick. I say to the devil with women!"

"Ah!" mused his friend. "A woman!"

"I didn't say so! Oh, I can't talk to any one! I came here to be alone."

"Excuse me," interrupted Richard, rising and moving toward the door.

"Don't be an ass, man. I've got to be with some one or I'll commit suicide."

"So bad as that? Come after some ducks with me in the morning."

"May I go with you?"

"Will it save you from suicide?"

"It might ease my mind a bit."

"Then go it is. I'm in for it now," he added to himself, as he went to his own room. "It's a woman; and I can help a man on the woman question about as easily as I can help a camel on the needle question."

It was two o'clock in the morning when old Captain Barkus knocked at Richard's door and bade him get up.

"No, I'm darned if I will," replied that gentleman sleepily.

"It's getting on toward sunrise, Mr. Darley," said the Captain through the door.

"I don't care if it's sunset!"

"Come on, Dick. I'm up," said Freddie through the door of his adjoining room.

Darley sat up in bed.

"You haven't slept, Freddie!"

"No."

"Reached anything yet?"

"No."

"Well! Well!" muttered Darley as he got slowly out of bed. "It's coming!"

So they dressed by candle light, walked downstairs and ate an egg and drank a cup of coffee with the Captain.

"Are the birds flying this morning, think, Barkus?" asked Darley.

"Sure, sir. There ain't been no sign o' moon; like enough thick weather to seaward and the wind comin' in from the east'ard pretty smart. But you gentlemen have got to move." And so they got out into the night, and came to the stand, and set out the decoys, and watched the Captain and his son row in either direction to turn toward them whatever of wild ducks might come in.

"We'll get a crack soon, Freddie. It's an ideal morning for them."

No response from the other.

"Suicidal leanings still strong?"

"Say, look here, Dick. Do you know Ethel Talbot?"

"Well! Well!" moaned Richard to himself. "It's come!" Aloud he answered, "No; why should I?"

"Well, you know who she is?"

"Certainly. She is Albert Talbot's daughter. He's treasurer of this club."

"I suppose so. Well, she's it, Dick."

"Oh, is she? Why doesn't she tag you, then?"

"Don't be an ass! I—she—I—she——"

"It?" suggested his friend.

"Hang it, man, she says I don't do anything; she says what's the good of a man who doesn't reach out; she says she'll be d——d if she'll tie up to a slob like me."

"Nice language she uses," interrupted Richard, as he kept his eyes on the horizon.

"Well, you know. She won't stand for it."

"How much have you got, Freddie?"

"Five thousand a year."

"How much of it did you make?"

"Make? You know very well the governor left it to me."

"What do you do for more?"

"Why, nothing."

Darley watched the light grow in the east for a moment and then said:

"She probably is a decent girl as women go——"

"She's a dream, man!"

"——decent girl as women go, and wanted to see if you could do anything. And you killed the goose by saying you wouldn't try."

"But we could live on what I have and what she——"

"By gad, here they come!" cried Darley suddenly. "Right there to the eastward of the point. Keep down, man! Keep down! Now they turn. Wait till I tell you to fire. They'll be over the 'coys in an instant. Take the last bird, Freddie, the last bird! Easy—easy—they've turned—no, here they come! Wait, now, wait!" The little specks seemed to grow suddenly larger instead of coming nearer and then they swung in over the decoys and came on with prodigious velocity.

"Now!" And both men fired. The last bird moved swiftly on. The next to the last dropped into the water.

"Thunder! I believe I missed."

"I believe you did, Freddie," and they waited to see if the birds would turn in a second time.

"I can't hit anything. I'm too done up."

"Well?"

"Well. I told her I'd try to do something, and she said she couldn't agree to any waiting game—and what the deuce can I do?"

"What is the name of that uncle of yours?" asked Darley the next moment.

"Who? Uncle William Stevens?"

"Yes, what is he?"

"President of the Ninth National, downtown."

"Go to him and get a ten-dollar-a-week job. Then see what the lady says."

Silence for a moment.

"Dick, you are invited to the Denham's dance for Monday night——"

"And I'm not going."

"Will you go and meet her and talk to her—and—tell her about it?"

A groan, all but audible, was followed by a start. "There they come again! Get down! Ge-e-et down, low! Easy, now, easy! And for Heaven's sake, don't miss this time!"

II

THE Denham's dance was in full force up on an upper floor of Delmonico's—some hundred people or more—and as Darley entered somewhat late he saw a whirl of dark figures mixed up with pink and blue and white gowns of a very fairylike nature. It was a pretty sight, and he stood watching it when one black-and-white affair dissolved itself into two people, and he was shaking hands with a young person with gray eyes and brown hair whom Freddie Beaumont introduced as Miss Ethel Talbot.

"I've heard a great deal about you," she said.

"Nice subject, isn't it?"

"I don't know yet."

"Where have you been, Dick, all the evening?" asked Beaumont.

"Working," replied the other, as Freddie, without waiting for a reply, took himself off.

"Working at what?" asked a quiet voice, as Darley felt a white glove take his proffered arm.

"The struggle for existence, so-called," he answered.

"What do you do, Mr. Darley?"

"Lord, Lord! Here is where it all came from," he muttered. Then he said aloud: "Oh, I write editorials that astound the universe——"

"But you are really at work and doing something?"

"Well, you see neither Freddie's governor nor mine left me five thousand a year." And his eyebrows rose slightly.

The gray eyes certainly showed the possibilities of humor.

"Freddie has just seen his uncle, and a week from to-day he goes into the bank to begin work."

"At ten dollars a week?" he asked apprehensively.

"No," laughed the young lady; "at fifty dollars a week."

"That's a splendid beginning," said Darley. "And, Miss Talbot, Freddie Beaumont is worth it, worth very much more—don't you think so?"

"Do you think so?"

"I do. Much more."

"You like shooting, don't you?"

"Yes. We all like what we cannot get."

"So do I," said she quietly.

"What do you shoot with?" and he looked straight in her eyes.

Miss Talbot returned the look for an instant.

"Are you a flirt, Mr. Darley?"

"God forbid, madam," he said hastily.

"I think He does," she answered. Then, after a pause: "Do you write only editorials?"

"No; I write great works: poems, novels, plays."

"Do you really? Where are they published?"

"They are seldom published, Miss Talbot. Only the grasping money-makers publish their works."

"You are making fun of me. Tell me the truth."

"I wouldn't dare to—shall we go in and dance?"

"No! let us go into that palm-room and sit down instead."

"You read my thoughts. You are really a very wonderful person."

"Such a trite thing to say, isn't it?" said she, leaning back on a small sofa.

"So many people tell you so, then?" with a smile.

"Not at all," said she quickly. "But it is so foolish to talk to me like that."

"Then let us talk of Freddie."

"Why of him?"

"Because I know you like him, and have known him a long time; and because I have known him a long time and like him, too. He is a good mortal and will soon be better yet."

"He has a good friend, anyway. Did he tell you to talk to me of him?"

"Not in the least," said Darley firmly.

"He said he did," and an innocent manner scarcely concealed a gleam of humor.

"The fool! The ass! The idiot!" muttered Richard. "I imagine this must be the case where the boy lied."

"Which boy?"

"I am a decrepit old man, Miss Talbot."

"Your exterior is beautifully preserved, then," said she, looking gravely at him.

"Would it be discourteous of me to ask if you are a flirt, Miss Talbot?"

"Would it be profanity for me to reply 'God forbid,' Mr. Darley?"

Then for some reason they both laughed. And she suddenly leaned forward and asked him:

"Do you, sir, in your literary career——"

"Newspaper career," he put in parenthetically.

"——ever read poetry?"

"Sometimes," suspiciously.

"Ever read Longfellow's Miles Standish?"

"Miss Talbot, you are incorrigible. It isn't fair."

"Then speak for yourself," she said; adding hastily, "about shooting." And for an instant a little flush stood on her cheek.

He leaned back in his chair and laughed again.

"Well,

"'I like to shoot my little gun
At any time of day.
I like to see the rabbits run—
Unless they get away.'"

"Will you try to be serious, sir?" frowning with much severity. "Do you know I shot a deer last fall in the Adirondacks?"

"No, did you really? What rifle did you use?" And he leaned forward with a new spark in his eye—a spark that was noted the moment it appeared.

"A 40-.30. And it was perfectly dear!"

"A little heavy for you, I should say. Better make it a 30-.30 half magazine. You can do a good deal better with that. I had a chance once——" He stopped suddenly, for in the face near his he caught the trace of a smile—"er—shall we dance?"

"Please, please!" she pleaded, quite serious now. "Is that fair to a helpless girl?"

And then they were off in a discussion of the technical questions of rifles, all of which, to his intense amazement and delight, she understood. And he sat more and more on the edge of his chair and she leaned forward with her white gloved elbows on her white silk knees. Looking up suddenly for some corroboration or denial, she discovered his face lit up with something that had not been there a moment before, and she said abruptly:

"Do you know you are exactly like your sister?"

"My sister!"

"Yes, your sister Ethel."

"Ethel?" he said again in the same dazed tone.

"Yes, Ethel. That's my name, too, you know."

"You don't mean to tell me you're Ethel's Ethel?"

"Oh, no! I'm Priscilla What's-her-name."

"Why, but Ethel's been telling me about you for the last four hundred years!"

"Not quite so long as that." And she laughed gayly at his embarrassment.

"But then you can't be over nineteen!"

"It was you who said I was four hundred."

Then he stood over her a moment in undisguised amazement, until she reached up her hand and said demurely:

"Won't you shake hands with an old friend?"

He took it—took it all—grasped it and held it thus until the embarrassment appeared on her face, when the hand was suddenly drawn away as a cheery voice behind them said:

"Well, children, how goes it? Pushing a good thing along?"

Without hesitation the little lady said:

"We were just shaking hands and saying good-night, for I see mamma coming with a 'go-home' look on her face."

And as Freddie and his friend walked away Darley could only mutter to himself: "Yes, Freddie, pushing a good thing along."

III

TEN days later while he was fixing his third cup of coffee, Darley glanced at two or three letters lying by his toast. The first was a bill for an expensive pair of shoes with "Please remit" written beneath it. He tore it up, muttering that the poor he had with him always. The next was a notification of a meeting of a committee. He tore that up. The third was an invitation to dine with Mrs. Talbot, and it said, "I want to have the pleasure of meeting you, too."

"Too!" said Richard, addressing the coffee machine. "Such a little word. I wonder if it was a pleasure. I will go and see."

And a few evenings later he walked into the Talbots' drawing-room.

"I'm so glad you could come," said Miss Talbot.

"Could I refuse when mamma said 'Too'?"

"Two? Two what?"

He handed her the invitation.

"I never said any such thing," said she.

"Ah," he said to himself. "Then she did, after all."

"We are delighted to have you here," exclaimed Mrs. Talbot, shaking him languidly by the hand. "Ethel told us so much about you that we really had to see for ourselves."

He looked at her, but she did not waver; "I only said you were a cynic."

"Aha!" he laughed. "Splendid! It's my one ambition—to be a cynic! Do you like cynics, Mrs. Talbot?"

"Why, really, Mr. Darley, not as a rule, you know. Don't they say rude things and dress badly?"

He looked down at his clothes: "They are the best I have."

"Oh, really I—I meant nothing personal," added the lady a little nervously. "There's nothing the matter with your clothes."

"I'll try not to be rude," he said plaintively.

"Oh, but you mustn't take it as—ah, dinner is ready! Will you take in Ethel, Mr. Darley?"

"Are you really a cynic?" asked Ethel as they took their places at table.

"Of course, since you say so."

"But Freddie says you are not. That you are——"

"Well, what did Freddie say?"

"Shall I give you his exact words?"

"Of course."

"That you are a dear, good fellow trying to be cynical, but failing miserably." And the young woman looked down at her oysters.

"Freddie lies in his teeth," answered Darley softly.

After a pause: "Tell me about the editorials."

"Ladyship, shall I tell you the story of my life?"

"Do try to be serious. I am really interested."

"Well," said he with a sigh, "there are three to be done to-night."

"What about?" she asked with interest.

"The first as to whether cynics really must wear bad clothes——"

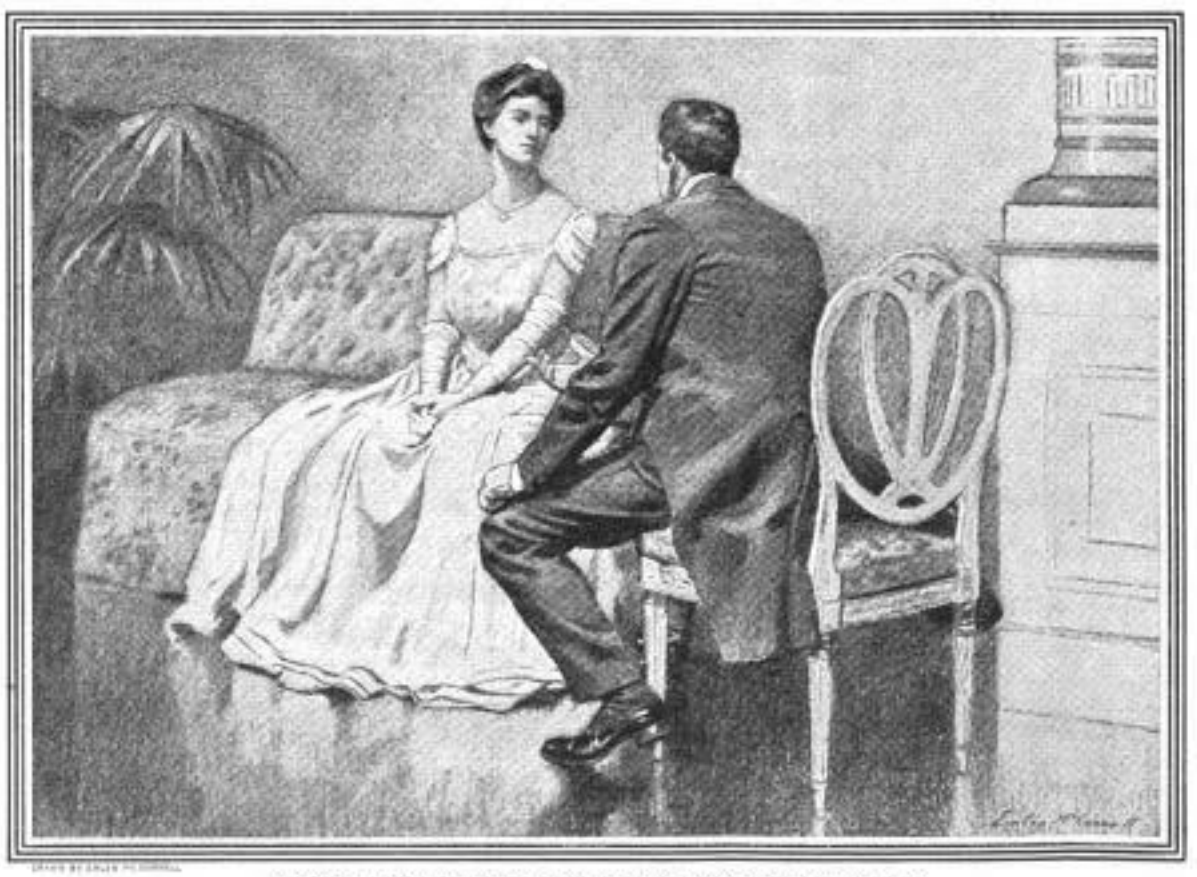
"Dear, good mamma, she meant well, anyway."

"The second as to whether pink or white goes best with gray eyes."

"Which shall you decide?"

"That both being perfect, the question is laid on the table."

"So silly," said she. "And the third?" as a little smile passed over her face.



"Ah, the third!" said he; "that is very serious. I cannot tell you about the third."

"Please!"

"I don't dare to."

"I won't tell."

"Well," and of a sudden the lines about his jaw set a little, "the third will be a discussion as to whether a girl has the sense and honor to marry the man she has led on to love her."

There was a pause. Then gradually a flush appeared on her face. He saw it grow, and the pause became embarrassing, when a very sweet but a very distant voice said:

"And what will you decide to be the likelihood?"

"I've changed my mind about that editorial. I shall not write it," he answered, looking down at his plate.

"Why?"

"Because it isn't fair."

"No, it isn't fair," said she. "And now I must talk to the man on the other side."

"Please don't go!"

"It is rude not to."

"Is that a lesson for me?"

"Does the shoe fit? There is a very marriageable, attractive girl on your right."

"If you do not come back soon I shall be married," said he with plaintive emphasis.

Darley turned to the marriageable heiress and became at once strangely fascinated by a tiny mole on the side of her nose which moved up and down every time she laughed. He tried not to look at it, and yet it was impossible not to say things that might draw a smile. Meantime he heard little or nothing, but felt himself growing lightheaded and more or less inclined to think that this was a great world and life worth living, after all.

In the midst of this a conciliatory voice said sweetly:

"I received a 30-.30 the other day and don't know who sent it."

"Did you really? How did it suit?"

"It is better than the heavy one. I tried it in a gallery to-day."

"Cleave unto it until death do you part. It is the best for you."

"You must come and see it some time."

"May I soon?"

"Will you?"

"And is my—my editorial forgiven?"

"There is nothing to forgive," said she, rising with the others, "only—only—no, there's nothing to forgive."

An hour and a half later Darley was standing at the window of his club gazing down on Fifth Avenue, with his hands thrust into his pockets. There was no avenue with reflecting rain mirrors on the asphalt, nor yet any bright-eyed cabs hurrying by, only two large gray eyes close to the window-pane, and Richard had the feeling that he must step through the glass and into the eyes, which were private rooms containing many jewels. He was murmuring to himself: "I wonder how long it will be before he discovers the burglar," when Beaumont's voice hailed him from behind.

"I was wondering," said Darley in reply, "where Fifth Avenue and the cabs and the rain had gone."

"What? Oh, chuck it! Let me tell you. I've got a chance to be assistant bond clerk. Uncle William's a brick.'

"I dined at Mrs. Talbot's to-night," said Darley.

Freddie sat up quickly.

"Did you?" said he. "How is she?"

"Very nice, I think; a little gray and a little nervous, but then the mother of four grown——"

"Thunder, Dick, I don't mean mamma."

"Oh, you mean Miss Talbot?"

"Did you suppose I meant the maid? How did she seem?"

"Pretty well. Nice girl."

"Oh, stuff, man. Did she—did you—er—talk about me at all?"

"Yes, sir, we considered your marked ability as a Wall Street financier."

"Did she like it?" asked Freddie eagerly.

"She did not condemn it. You'd better go and see her and tell her about it. And, by the way, tell her to change the combination on the safe."

"The combination on the what?" asked the other. "Ah, Major!"

"Good-evening, young men. I'm just in time. I know you'll try just a taste in my honor—my birthday, you know."

Beaumont stood a moment undecided and then left the other two alone. As they sat together in the corner of the room, a moment later, Darley said:

"Major, why did you never marry?"

The old gentleman took his cigar from his mouth and turned abruptly to his questioner.

"Gad, sir, marry! Why in the deuce should I?"

"Oh, family ties, you know; little tots doing the cluster act about that gouty knee of yours—duty to humanity—sweet comforts in your old age, and such other elemental notes of the unit of civilization."

"Unit be d——d, sir! I don't want any of your snivelling tots knocking around my knee. Nor any women and folderols to pay for. No, sir, nor any one woman. Look at me now! Happy as a clam. No worries. Anybody I want to wait on me, and a few friends with your elements of civilization all laid out and glad to show me any time I take it into my head to try them. Here I go on Sunday afternoons to Albert Talbot's, and I get more of the elements than I can digest all the week. No, sir," as he twisted his side-whiskers forward and replaced the cigar with a certain finality between his lips—"no, sir! God forbid that I should have been such a fool! I'm as happy as a kid with a new toy now."

"Well, Major, here's to you! I'll go to bed and dream of the joys of bachelorhood—if I can get rid of other dreams," he added to himself.

IV

"I DON'T suppose you would have come if I hadn't written you."

"I was afraid," said Richard, watching her as she sat in some soft lacy gown with the late afternoon sunlight behind her, "I said so many rude things the other night."

BUT THE FIRST BIRD HE KILLED HAD GRAY EYES

"Did you? I took them to be the proper sayings of a masquerading cynic. Here's my first child." And she held up the rifle.

"May you be blessed with many of them," said he.

"One is quite enough. I don't go into the woods often enough for more."

"Two at least are necessary to furnish companionship," and he handed the rifle back to her. She laid it across her knees and looked at him.

"You are speaking of guns?"

"You spoke of children," he answered.

A quick tinge of color came into her face and grew as she spoke on.

"Yes, I think children are dear; don't you?"

"Yes."

"Even to cynics?"

"All the more so, because they understand us better than grown people."

She leaned forward a little and said: "Why have you never married?"

"Takes two."

"And——" she asked, turning the gun over.

"Number two not in at the roll-call."

"Masquerading?"

"No, sincere for once."

"Is there—is there any one who—who ought to be in at the roll-call?"

He looked at her earnestly.

"Yes, Miss Talbot."

A shade went over her face.

"Tell me about her."

"I can't. She belongs to another."

"Oh dear! Is she married?"

"No." And again he resolved to tell Freddie to get a new combination on the safe.

Ethel's face turned to the rifle and one white hand moved back and forth over the polished barrel.

"Engaged?"

"No-o."

The white hand stopped.

"Why bound, then?"

"Because the right man has her—her affections."

"How do you know?"

"Don't cynics have any sense of the fitness of things?"

"Not always."

"Shouldn't they be respectable members of society and know what is true and right and try to act up to it?"

"Might not she have something to say in the matter?" said she.

He did not know. He began to lose confidence in himself and decided it was wiser to leave.

When he was gone Ethel sat down upon the floor with the gun across her knees and—cried.

V

IT WAS getting on toward spring one night when Darley sat in his rooms. Richard found it difficult to keep up this playing with fire. He sat now evolving a plan for stopping the business, when Beaumont came in.

"What's up, Freddie?" asked the host.

"Everything's down," answered the other, sinking into a chair. "Dick, you're the only one I can talk to."

"Well?"

"Something's up. I saw Ethel last night, gave out much business news—and something's got in between. I can see it with one eye closed and the other shut."

"Well?"

"I'm in a fearful funk! What's the matter, do you suppose? Have I lost a place just as I was getting up to the tape?"

"Why, you idiot, don't you see she's only surprised at your being able to 'reach up'?"

"But I mustn't lose."

"No, Freddie, you mustn't lose. Show your nerve. Go and see her—take her by masculine force."

Beaumont thought a moment and then, slapping his knees, said:

"I'll do it. I'll go right now."

"No, no, don't go now," said the other in some trepidation. "Wait till nine o'clock, when they will be through dinner."

"All right," answered the other, "but it's a long time to wait—two hours."

"Oh, that's nothing in a lifetime. And so you won't go till after nine, sure?" And Freddie disappeared with the promise given.

He had no sooner left the room than Darley went to his writing-desk and wrote her:

> "I have been playing a mean part. My only excuse is that I did not see the meanness until the last day or two. I don't know how to write it, and I am having a hard time thinking how to make it clear without seeming to you a conceited ass. Perhaps the only way is the direct way. So here goes: To-night after you receive this there comes to you a young man—a fine fellow. He is the right one! Talk to him and hear what is in his heart. There is no other man to compare with him. Don't for a moment think there is! Is that impudent—none of my business? I do not mean it so. Only I'm very sorry for it all—for my mean part in it, and—I'm very sad—in fact I should like to stretch my thirty-year-old six-foot hulk on the floor and cry.
> "Good-by, sweet lady—good-by!"

"Peter," said Richard to the boy who answered his ring, "take this note to that address at once and then come back here and show me a receipt."

VI

IT WAS a miserable situation for a cynic. That was quite evident. But then, he had given up other things in this world because they were not for him, and he could give this up, too. It was only necessary to use a little philosophy and get interested in something else. And thus by nightfall of the next day he was sitting in the main room of the Naugatuck Club, and in the morning he was out on the lake with Captain Barkus watching for ducks. But the first bird he killed had gray eyes, and he stroked its feathers and apologized to it and said he would marry it—and then he threw it into one corner and swore softly to himself.

"You hain't got yer eye with yer to-day, have ye?" remarked the Captain.

"Yes, but it's gray."

"Eh?" queried the Captain.

"Gray, man! Haven't you ever seen gray eyes?"

"Aye, but what's them to do with duck shooting?"

"Oh, I'm going home," said Darley. And he strode off through the woods, leaving the Captain to drive back alone in some wonder as to what his young friend had imbibed. As he went along, if he failed to read sermons in the stones, he had no difficulty in reading love stories here and there along the way. He wondered how the letter had been received. He wondered if she thought him an ass, if she laughed at him. And then he became aware of the fact that she was coming toward him in the narrow path. At first he thought it was his absurd imagination that had run riot, and then in an instant he knew that she must see him and that he could not escape.

She looked up and stopped short.

"What do you mean by coming here!" said the young lady.

"I didn't mean to," said he aimlessly.

"I came here to be alone," said she as they still stood watching one another.

"So did I," answered he. "Excuse me"—and he made as if to turn about.

"You knew I would be here," said she suspiciously.

"I did not really even suspect that you could come here. If I had I should not have come."

"Oh, what a thing to say!" cried she.

"That is, I wanted to avoid you—I mean, I knew you did not want to see me."

No answer.

"Excuse me." And he stepped aside. She hurried by. Then she stopped suddenly, and without turning her head she said:

"Were you going back to the clubhouse?"

"Why, no——"

"Because if you were I should like—I think I have somehow lost the path——"

"Certainly," said he, coming close to her; "I was just thinking of getting back to breakfast."

They turned toward the house and walked silently along the little path in the morning light. Not a word did either say.

Up the steps they marched and into the house. There stood Albert Talbot.

"Ah, here you are, Ethel—How-do, Darley? Where's Fred Beaumont, Ethel? I thought he'd be here by the late train last night."

"I don't think he will come, father. He went to Aiken last night." And Miss Ethel gazed innocently at the rug.

"Aiken last night! Good Heavens, what a man!" said the father. "He said yesterday that he'd follow us up here!"

At breakfast little was said. Darley sat by Miss Talbot, and when the meal was nearly over he said:

"Shall I go away?"

And she answered:

"How can I tell?"

"Did you bring your 30-.30?"

"No. What good would a rifle be here?"

"Did you ever try a shotgun?"

"No."

"Would you—would you care to try at ducks this afternoon?"

"Were you going?"

"Yes."

"I shouldn't inconvenience you?"

"No, you wouldn't inconvenience me."

"Then I'll go. What time?"

"About three o'clock."

As they sat in the shooting stand by the little lake, late that afternoon, there came Barkus' signal of warning over the water.

Darley said:

"So Freddie didn't come yesterday?"

"No," said she, looking out on the bay through one of the holes in the wall of the stand.

"Has he gone to Aiken in search of—anything?"

"Not for me."

"Are you all alone in the world?"

"Oh, no. I have father."

"Are you cold?"

"No."

Alarming signals of warning from Barkus across the bay.

"Are your hands cold?"

"No."

"Let me see."

She raised the nearer one, looked at it a moment and slowly drew off the thick glove. And her ladyship seemed intent on the bay.

"It's very cold," said he at last.

No answer.

Then he carried the hand slowly to his lips.

There came the sound of an oar outside the stand.

"What in tarnation be you doin', Mr. Darley? Hain't you seen them ducks?"

Darley got up suddenly.

"What? Where? What's that, Barkus?"

"Why, them fifteen birds what come nigh on to knocking the stand down."

"Strange I didn't see them, Barkus," said Darley. "But Miss Talbot finds it too cold here. We'll have to give it up and walk back through the woods."

And they two left the stand—left Barkus grumbling at such blindness—and started along the little woodland path, just as the red setting sun looked over the hills and trickled down through the trees upon them—these two, walking in the cold, clear evening, hand in hand, silently.

Repartees and Retorts

By William Mathews

LORD BEACONSFIELD, depicting a certain person in one of his novels, says that "he could always, when necessary, sparkle with anecdote or blaze with repartee." It is needless to say which of these is the higher social gift. Scores of men, with tenacious memories and a ready flow of words, can amuse a social circle with a perennial flow of anecdotes, who yet have no talent for repartee. The man of anecdotes, however apt or felicitous in telling them, seldom fails to bore his hearers by frequent repetition—a practice which leads another of the novelist's characters to say that "when a man falls into his anecdotage, it is time for him to retire from the world."

It is well known that for the highest success of a witticism it is necessary that it should seem to be impromptu. The finest jeu d'esprit, the happiest hit, which is known to have been coolly and deliberately prestudied and kept in ambush, can never have the effect of even an inferior one which is a real flash of the fancy, an inspiration of the moment, a sudden and irrepressible outburst. Brilliant and telling as was the conversational wit of Sheridan, our admiration of it is greatly lessened when we are told that it was carefully elaborated before its utterance. We now know, what his applauding hearers did not, that he would wait patiently a whole evening at a dinner-party for the exact moment when the shaft which he had ready feathered might be let fly with the greatest effect. There was no effort, either obvious or disguised, to draw you into the ambuscade of his ready-made joke; and when the lucky, longed-for moment did at last arrive, the natural and apparently unexpected manner in which he would let the treasured sentiment fall from his lips at once astonished and charmed his hearers. Such facts as these show that in many cases spoken wit, though to all appearance extemporaneous, may have been premeditated; but there is one species of it to which the most skeptical hearer cannot deny the merit of spontaneity—we mean the repartee. Especially is this true when the repartee is in reply to a sudden and unexpected attack. Nothing is more admirable, nothing more quickly wins our sympathy, than the perfect command and instantaneous concentration of the faculties, when a man is taken at a disadvantage and triumphantly repels an insinuation or an insult without a moment's previous warning. That felicity of instant rejoinder which we call readiness has saved thousands of men from mortification and contempt. The dexterous leap of thought by which the mind escapes from a seemingly hopeless dilemma is worth all the logic and learning in the world. The impromptu reply, says Molière, is precisely the touchstone of wit.

One of the readiest Englishmen at repartee was "the English Aristophanes," Samuel Foote. Doctor Johnson was long so prejudiced against him that, dining once in his company, he affected not to listen to him. "But the dog was so very comical," he afterward said, "that I was obliged to lay down my knife and fork and have the laugh out." "Why are you forever humming that tune?" said Foote to an acquaintance. "Because it haunts me." "No wonder," rejoined the wit, "you are ever murdering it." When the miserly Garrick was vainly searching for a guinea at the Bedford one night, Foote asked, "Where on earth can it be gone?" "To the devil, I think," said the actor. "Let you alone, David," exclaimed Foote, "for making a guinea go farther than any one else." When a rich contractor was descanting upon the instability of the world, he turned to Foote and said: "Can you account for it, sir?" "Not unless it was built by contract," was the reply.

A Battle of the Nations

A TELLING reply was made during the Franco-German War by an English lady who held a "salon" in London, to the French Ambassador, who complained bitterly that England had not intervened in behalf of France: "We always believed that you were a nation of shopkeepers, and now we know you are." "And we," instantly replied the lady, "always believed that you were a nation of soldiers, and now we know you are not."

The late Bishop Wilberforce of England is said to have been endowed with rare powers of repartee, which he did not hesitate to exercise in the social circle or on the platform. To a hearer who tried to annoy and disconcert him, while addressing a great meeting in St. James' Hall, London, by frequently shouting, "Speak up, my lord!" he replied in the most dulcet tone, "I am already speaking up; I always speak up, and I decline to speak down to the level of the ill-mannered person in the gallery." This reminds us of a retort of Theodore Parker in a speech which we heard him make nearly sixty years ago at an Anti-Slavery meeting in Faneuil Hall. Upbraiding the North for making money out of Southern slavery, he said: "Seventy years ago the first three articles of the religious creed of Massachusetts were these: 'I believe in God the Father Almighty; I believe in Jesus Christ, His Son; I believe in the Holy Ghost; and these three are one God.' Now, the practical creed is: 'I believe in the Gold Eagle Almighty; I believe in the Silver Dollar; I believe in the Copper Cent; and these three make one Money.'"

This sarcasm was received with a loud burst of applause, mingled with an outpouring of hisses. Turning to a prominent hisser in the gallery, Parker, in nowise disconcerted, said, in a tone of mingled defiance and contempt: "I have given you your belief in my own language, and you have responded in your own vernacular."

Though Sheridan generally premeditated and husbanded his antithetical sprightliness, yet he could and did, when hard pressed, throw off retorts as readily as he hiccoughed to the watchman in London who found him "half-seas over" and demanded his name, "W-w-wilberforce!" When told that the fretful critic, Richard Cumberland, had expressed his surprise that an audience had laughed so immoderately at a performance of The School for Scandal, which did not extort from him even a smile, Sheridan said: "Cumberland is truly ungrateful for not smiling at my comedy, for I saw a tragedy of his, a fortnight before, at Covent Garden, and laughed incessantly from the beginning to the end." A tersely felicitous reply to a strenuous but shallow advocate of modern studies was that of Lord Sherbrooke. "I have the greatest contempt for Aristotle," said the "advanced thinker." "But not that contempt which familiarity breeds, I should imagine," mildly rejoined his lordship. Not less mild and equally significant was the reply of the Rev. James Marriott, "the great Saint of the Tractarian Movement at Oxford," to a brother-Fellow of Oriel College, who had behaved outrageously at dinner overnight. Coming out of chapel the next morning he sought to apologize, saying: "My friend, I'm afraid I made rather a fool of myself last night." "My dear fellow, I assure you I observed nothing unusual."

THE CHRONICLES OF REM

THE FIRE IN THE PINES

By H. S. CANFIELD

WE HAD been to the lick and noted the fresh tracks of the night before.

The shooting platform was built twenty feet up, nailed to a great hemlock thirty yards distant. Rem was used to curl up on it and go to sleep, waking to shoot methodically, come down, take up the carcass and go home. It seemed strange that a deer could come within fifty yards of it, day or night, without seeing it, for it was not concealed in any way, but Rem explained this by saying that a "deer has less sense than a cheap landlooker." Rem has not read Mr. Ernest Thompson-Seton, and has small opinion of the wit of wild animals. Most of them, he says, are "honing to get killed."

We sat on a white birch which had crashed to its fall five years before and Rem dug his one-bladed knife deep into the punk, bringing it out in big brown chunks. It was like tinder, this stuff, and when a match was touched to it glowed instantly into coals.

"This kind o' log is good meat for fire," Rem said. "They catch at nothing, like a gal fishing for compliments, and, like the gal again, they blaze for days. There's thousands of 'em in the woods—tens of thousands. Sometimes you see 'em lying twisted where one of them narrow storms has been along and then they're piled and bent and locked like a log-jam. When lightning hits a place like that you've got something as big as a town burning for a week. Fire is the worst thing in the world; next to it is a fool; when the two get together they're just ter'ble.

"Fires in the North Woods has cost a thousand lives and twenty-six million dollars in money. Some of 'em started from the clouds, but not many. Most of 'em happened because a fool out walking had a match. If the people that was left ever caught the fool they fixed him so's he quit thinking about his troubles, but gen'ully the fire fixed him fust.

"If you never see one of them forest fires you don't never want to see one. Your dreams'll be better without it. Hell won't be any news to me. I had oughter be able to find my way around in it; I've saw it three times in the woods.

"A forest fire just spells Death—D-e-t-h! It's worse'n drouth or flood or storm. A man can chew green leaves and walk out of a drouth; he can swim out of a flood, or go with it till he finds a limb handy; he can lay down under a fallen tree crosswise of the track of a storm and the big trees will tumble over him without hurting; but he can't do anything with a fire 'cept run with his tongue hanging out and his knees bending under him—run till he drops, with red cinders all around him and smoke in his nose, and a scairt deer will plant his hoofs on his back before the flames get him. He will have time to think about it.

"Now, the burning is awful, but the worst thing about it is the fear. It starts among the birds and it spreads to the brutes, and from the brutes it spreads to the men, and they're all wild together. You're running, you know, putting in your best licks, and you say to yourself: 'I'm doing a good ten mile an hour; I'm holding my wind fine; I'll beat that fire out;' and the next minute the fear grips you and you don't know nothing. When you come to you're in the water, or you don't come to. Maybe you get it from a buck that goes by you like an arrer from a Chip'way's blowgun; maybe you get it from a fall, or a limb that knocks your hat into your eyes; you get it. The beasts are all crazy, and they can give a man fear like a mangy mink can give him the hand-itch or a crazy wolf can give him the dog-madness. A man that's got the fire-fear is lower than the brutes and crazier, because he thinks more of himself and has got more to lose."

Rem was remembering hard. His face was white and sweat came from under his hatband. He sent his knife to the hilt into the rotten birch.

"One fall," he said, "we was hunting and trapping up in the big pine lands about the Brulé. We camped on Dog Crick that runs into the Brulé from the north. The timber's out of that country now—nothing there but hemlock and blamed little of that—but then it was a wonder. The trees went up two hundred feet and so close that their branches touched. There was hazel brush in the hollows and sumach on the hillsides, with just enough maple and birch among the pines and hemlocks to make it good. In the swamps the tamaracks was thick as poor kin round a rich man's kitchen stove, and when the frost fell you could stand on a hill and see the leaves yellow like gold for miles; the maples was red in half-acre bunches and over 'em the black-green of the pines.

"It was dry. August went and not a drop of rain; September went and not a drop; we was at the middle of October, and not a drop. Dog Crick dried until you could jump across it backward. The holes was half water and half trout. The trees looked thirsty. If you brushed again a pine the bark come off in dust. The needles and leaves under foot cracked, and sitting on a runway you could hear a deer coming fifty yards away. That'll give you an idee of how dry it was, for a deer steps like a woman on velvet. The moss on roots turned brown; there was mighty little sap in the limbs, and they creaked like rusty hinges when they swung in the wind. There was water in Mallard Lake five miles to the east; there was water in the Brulé ten miles to the south; there was water in Sailor Lake six miles to the west; and that was all. Every little woods pond was as bare as your hand and the dead perch in 'em stunk.

"Hunting was bad. We moved on moccasins, but it wouldn't have been any different if we had gone barefooted. We could kill only by squatting on the runways that led down to the water, and in a week the deer got to know about us and went to water only at night. We took our traps out of the Dog and moved 'em to the lakes, but we didn't pay much heed to 'em. It took too much walking.

"There was a lot of crows about that camp and in the middle of October they took to cawing steady; the devils cawed all day long. The tree-frogs was busy peeping for rain from sunup to sundown. Heaps of birds moved in on us to be near the crick. You could see 'em down by the edge with their bills open any time. There was something in the air that made us jerky. We couldn't sleep well, and when a man in the woods can't sleep his temper gets saw-teeth on it. We had a couple of turn-overs and went down to the crick and washed the blood off without speaking. Most times in camp when a fight's over all the mad's over, but it weren't that way with us. After a while it got so nobody had a word to say. We went to the traps alone and come back alone and eat supper like dumb men and crawled in. We hung together and kept on working because we had the pelts to sell and divide; that was all held us.

"A man in that camp was named Jack Mace. He was fifty years old and his hair and whiskers was yellow and white. We called him Gray Jack. This Gray Jack was a arguefier. He'd argue 'bout the weight of a fish, 'bout the age of a mink, 'bout how many feet a pine would cut, 'bout what time the sun rose and what day of the month it was, and how old George Wash'n'ton was when he come to this country. He was a man that never was wrong in his life; he was a man that knowed more'n the whole town of Chicaggy; he was obst'nit as a Merino ram; he was savage as a littered sow; he smoked all of the time 'cept at his meals and when he was asleep, he went to bed with a pipe in his mouth, and he had matches in every pocket. We was afraid of Gray Jack, but you couldn't tell him nothing. He said he knowed it was dry and he'd saw it dryer.

"He started in the morning to look at a bear trap over on Mallard Lake. He went down the trail and blew a whiff of tobacco-smoke and it drifted over his shoulder. He had on a Mackinaw jacket, red and black, and carried a rifle, because you can't do nothing with a trapped bear but shoot it. He was a big man with wide shoulders, and his Mackinaw, red and black, blocked up the trail for fifty yards or so. Then he went around a bend, smoking hard.

"About ten o'clock Little Pete Mason's hound that was tied to a tree put up his head and howled. It was a long howl and he did it again. There ain't no lonesomer sound. Pete threw a chunk of wood at him. The dog jerked at the rope and howled, then laid down whining and shivered in the hot sun. A flock of jaybirds, maybe twenty of 'em, come flying and screaming. They lit in the trees around the camp, screamed and flew across the crick. A red-tailed hawk was sailing over the pines, rising and dropping, and he seemed to be looking for a chance to dive and nail a jaybird. I'd never seen 'em hunt that way in thick woods and said so. Leggy Taylor said: 'Hawks hunt any way; they ain't ch'ice; what they want is meat.'

"I said: 'The trouble with you is you're a fool.'

"Leggy says: 'You'll eat that!'

"Little Pete jumped between us and said: 'Sit down! For God's sake, sit down!'

"We sit down. I don't know what made him say 'For God's sake!' It didn't seem strange. Red squirrels was running, hopping twenty feet from tree to tree. They was going west; we saw a dozen of 'em at onst; they jumped the crick flying. A big bobcat went by at a lope ten rod away and Leggy said squirrel hunting would be good later. He meant the cat would get his bellyful. I was fixing a little spring trap for mink. The grip flew up and hurt my hand, and I stuck my fingers in my mouth and cussed. They both laughed loud and that made us all feel better.

"From down the trail that led to the east a covey of partridges jumped and sailed over our heads, their wings going like ripsaws. I could have knocked one down with a fishing-pole. The first moose-birds that had come from the north quit the camp and flew away. Two porcupines went by in a awful hurry; they was making as much as a mile an hour. A fox sneaked across the south edge of the clearing; three bucks and a doe went by like racehorses right behind the fox; we could hear 'em hit the far bank of the crick; three hundred yards to the south a wolf pack passed, but they wasn't on the trail of the deer and wasn't in cry; we knew they was passing by a short howl or two that sounded more like a hurt dog than anything else. Everything was headed west that day.

"Leggy had a nose like a p'nter pup. He threw up his head and sniffed. Then he wetted his finger in his mouth and held it up to test the breeze.

"'I must be smelling that camp-fire again' the wind,' he said. The smoke of it was blowing away from him. He walked to the east edge of the clearing, sniffed and said: 'Fire! Pine fire!'

"We jumped up and looked to the eastward over the tops of the trees. A thin, dun haze was drifting over the sky. We could just see the upper edge of it where it was thin, but as we looked it thickened and turned darker and climbed. We could see a hundred yards of it, and it was getting higher fast when the wind freshed on a sudden and come in a strong gust. It stopped and another gust come, bending the tree-tops away down. It died away short and a feather would have dropped straight to the ground, the air was so still. Them two gusts seemed to been throwed off the rest of the air like they was shot from a gun and we could hear 'em far away, roaring through the woods. Then the pines bent again and a big blow come on. It scattered the ashes of our fire and I kicked it out.

"We looked at one another and we knew what it meant. We thought of Gray Jack, but we didn't take time to cuss him. We knowed what had happened just as well as if we'd saw it. He'd been to his bear trap and found nothing. On his way back he lit his pipe and threw the match on some needles and come on. Half a mile behind him the fire got good headway. It burned maybe within a quarter of him afore he noticed it and then it was too late to do any good. It was only five miles to Mallard Lake, and that meant the fire had started not more'n four miles from us. It weren't more'n two miles when we noticed it and it was coming in jumps a hundred yards long, spreading lengthwise as it come. A big fire in dry woods looks to travel pretty near as swift as a freight train. We could hear the beasts crashing by on each side of us. We didn't have ch'ice of which way to go; Sailor Lake was the only place for us and that was six miles off.

"We didn't stop to pick up a gun or a blanket. We turned and run.

"We forgot the hound and he howled dismal when we hopped the crick. We stopped and looked at one another. He was jumping again' the rope fit to break his neck. Little Pete said: 'I don't give a d—n! He sha'n't burn!' and hurried back. He cut the rope with one slash of his knife, but the dog didn't stay with him. He passed us before we had covered a hundred yards, going with his belly within two inches of the ground, and Pete was nearly fifty yards behind us.

"You hear a lot about dogs' gratitood and noble feelings, and maybe they have 'em, but they ain't hounds.

"We had six miles to make and half a hour to make it in. We had two miles start of the fire and we knowed that it would likely travel the eight miles while we was doing six. There weren't no trail to Sailor Lake. It was straight through the timber, jumping logs every fifty yards, jumping 'em like bucks with a pack behind 'em and a river in front. Now, you know lumberjacks are fast and long on their feet; they've got to be. I can walk six miles an hour for five hours at a stretch, but there weren't no walking in that. We run with our elbows again' our sides, our eyes open and our mouths shet, and when we took a log we took it from the right foot, going over like birds, and lit running. That Leggy was a wonder! I heerd him say onst that he run for two mile with his arm straight out and his hand flat on a deer's tail, and he couldn't gain enough to crook his fingers. He was a liar, o' course, but he could go. He led me ten yards in the first hundred; I never see a man with as straight a back; his chin was tilted a leetle and he looked like he put down one foot before he picked up t'other; but I wouldn't yell to him to slow up; and Little Pete was fifty yard behind.

"I was running free and I didn't feel tired. At the end of the fust mile I got a wad of cotton behind my teeth and my nose felt stopped up, but I spit the cotton out and my second wind come. Then I see Leggy through the trees throw his head forward and lose the cotton and Pete coughed clost behind me, and their second wind come.

"The next thing I noticed I had run into a bunch of deer. There was four to the right and three to the left. Then I see they had run into me, for they went on like I was standing still. After that animals went by steady—all sorts of 'em. The deer and foxes and cats passed us, every one of 'em running for life, and it showed how trifling a man is on his legs because the porkies was the only things we could catch. A big black bear scrambled across between Leggy and me and didn't know we was alive. Three mile from the camp two gray wolves threw their heads back over their shoulders and snarled at me, but they went on. Maybe they thought I made the fire. Leggy was out of sight then. There was no birds any more; they had gone on safe. The woods was still as they are to-day. I could hear my feet pounding the leaves. My legs was made of iron and it looked like I run without trouble. I says to myself that I didn't know I could eat up the ground that way. Then I knowed there was some sort of animal close to me, so close I could touch it; I knowed it was on my left hand, though I didn't see it. I weren't afraid of it; a man ain't afraid of nothing them times 'cept fire. I slung my head round and it was Little Pete within a yard of me; he was lighter'n me and had run up even. He slung his head same time and saw me and we went on, breasts even and 'bout a yard atween us. It sorter comforted me to have him there.

"I heerd a humming sound like a swarm of wild bees and it was cur'ous. I didn't try to place it; it was just in my ears. Then it swelled louder, like more swarms of bees. Then it got deeper with a roar to it like a strong wind tearing through the tops of the pines, and then I knowed what it was. My breath come in so quick it like to choke me and I let out a link or two. It was the fire and it was clost enough to be heard. Soon it was so loud the air trembled and it come to me that it was gaining fast. I s'pose I were a mile from Sailor Lake then. I was running all right; I was good for twelve miles 'stead of six; the fire weren't near enough to throw its heat; but I guess it was then the fear gripped me. I dunno whether I got it from the animals; I dunno where I got it from; it gripped me. Pete's foot caught in a root as he rose to a log and he turned half a somerset. I didn't stop to help him, or see him get up. I dodged the trees somehow and I made my jumps somehow, but I b'leve I was more'n half blind. I can just remember seeing him fall. You can ask me what I wanted to yell for and I can't tell you; I needed all the wind I had; but I was yelling like a Indian; just straining and yelling.

"Now I could hear the trees fall as the wind and the flame mowed 'em down, and it seemed to me they would fall on me sure and burn me up, though they was two hundred yards behind; maybe more.

"A piece of hemlock bark, ten feet long and three feet wide and all aflame, sailed over me and fell in front. The leaves and needles where it fell blazed like oil and I jumped 'em, going away up. In a second the heat come. I felt it first on my back and it was just warm. Then the skin of my back begin to crawl under my shirt—I dropped my Mackinaw in the first mile—and then it seemed like a redhot iron was run up and down it. My hands got hot on the backs. I looked right and left and the fire was on each side of me not fifty yards away. It was trying to head me and cut me off. The roar around me was like thunder. I guess I was yelling, because my mouth was wide open, but you couldn't have heerd cannon in that place. My head was burning and I threw up my hand and felt my cap on fire. I tore it off and it started another blaze.

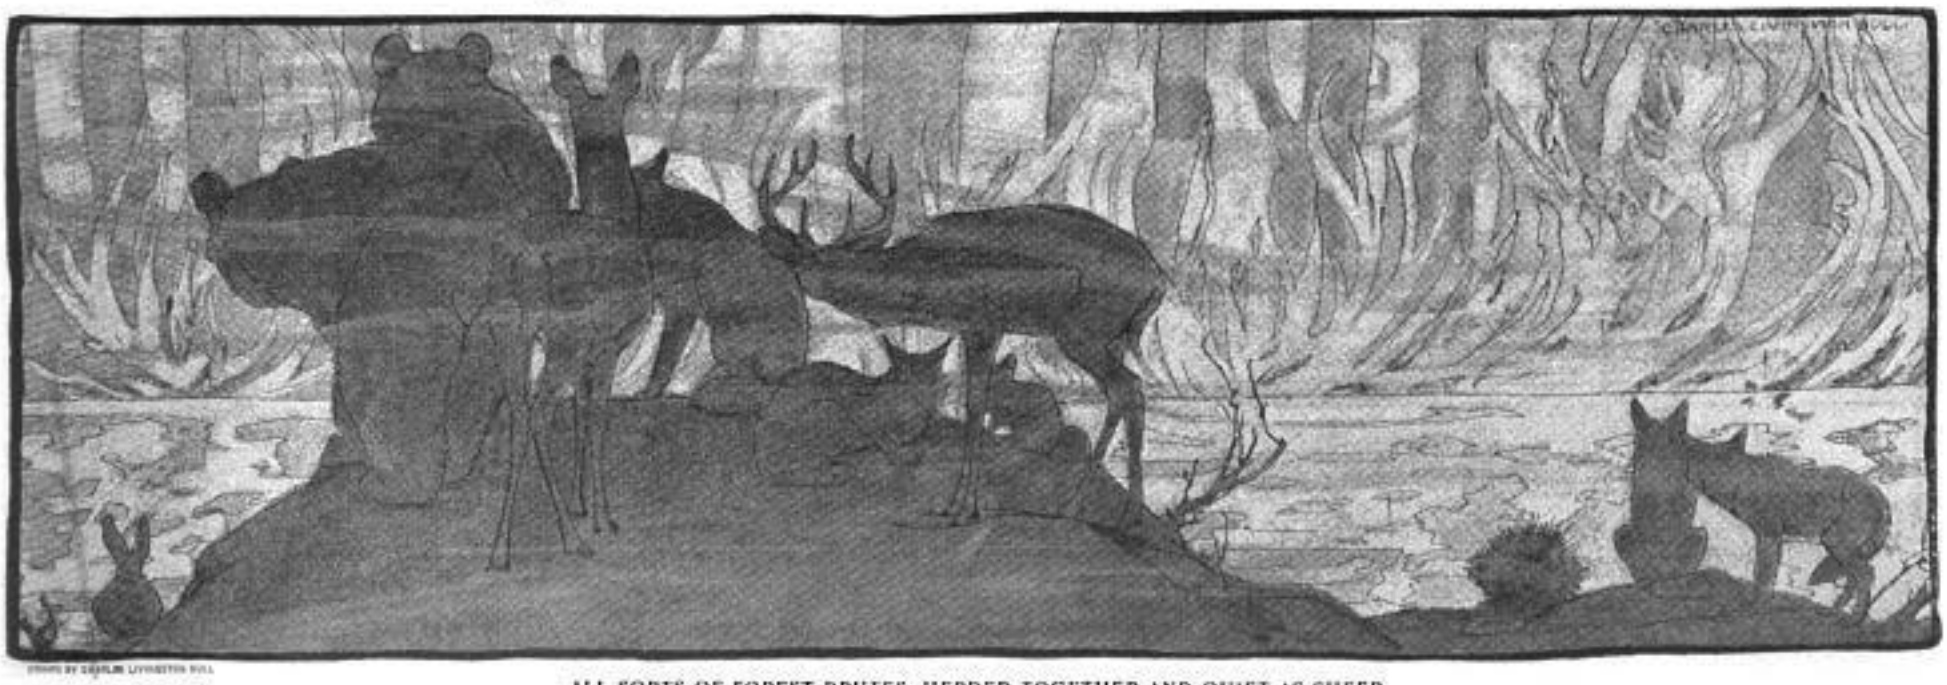
"Then I went down the side of a hill, going ten feet at a jump, and a big pine, blown down by the wind from the fire, fell alongside of me as I went. It missed me by a yard or so. The sky was just a blazing mass of bark and limbs, flying over like a wide, flat river made up of a million broken stars.

"Then I went head on into the ice-cold water.

"I swum hard under the lake and when I come up and got a breath I struck out. Limbs and bark was falling into the water all around me but none hit me. A quarter of a mile out was a chain of little rocky islands with nothing on 'em but grass and stunted bushes, a dozen islands or so, running for a mile. The cold water got the smoke and cinders out of my eyes, and, when I could see, there was Leggy on one of the islands, waving and shouting to me to come on. I could see he was shouting, but sure I couldn't hear. When I got to shallow water he run in and grabbed me and half hauled me to dry land. The island he was on weren't more'n ten feet square and he was the only living thing there, but right and left along the chain was all sorts of forest brutes, herded together and quiet as sheep. We saw as many as a hundred deer. Some bodies floated in the lake, a cat or two, porcupines and such things. All of the living ones—bears, wolves, deer—was safe from us and we was safe from them. My clothes was half burned off me and I was blistered in twenty places.

"'Where's Little Pete?' Leggy wanted to know fust off.

"I looked at him not more'n half understanding, and then I says: 'Where's Gray Jack?' and I waved my hand behind me.



"Along the shore far as we could see was just one roaring, jumping wall of flame; the trees fell into the lake, sending up clouds of steam; the torches and burning bark flew over us even where we were; the smoke made the sky as black as a coal and settled so we could not breathe away from the water.

"We stayed on the island that day and that night and swum to land next morning after daybreak. All of the animals was still on the islands, looking toward the land, but not moving. They was like a long Zoo. We took a big drink from the lake and walked thirty miles over hot ashes without a drop of water. Then we struck the settlement and I was in bed for two weeks. I had fever and waked up in the night nearly dead with the fear.

. . . . . .

"Nobody ever heard a word of Little Pete; the hound, if he lived, went wild, I guess. Some landlookers next summer, though, were in between our old camp and Mallard Lake and they come on the bones of a man. Near by was the barrel of a rifle. There was a round hole in the skull, so he went crazy from the fear."

Red Names for Red Men

SOME of the Indian chiefs and headmen whose boys and girls have been sent to Carlisle and other schools to be educated have just made a strong protest against any change in the names of their children. They say that it is the Indian custom to give to a child at birth a name with some family or spiritual significance, but that those forced on them on entering the schools have to an Indian no meaning whatever.

The protest is popularly regarded as absurd and fantastic; the average American usually takes the red man's ideas as a huge joke. But isn't there a basis of sound common-sense in this one idea?

The name which is given a boy when he comes into the world, by the time that he has carried it for a dozen or fifteen years, has become as much a part of him as his head or his hand; it is his property; it is he. What right have we to take it from him?

We don't stop the thousands of Podavitches and Maritskas who are crowding into Castle Garden every day to dub them Jim and Nancy. Why should not the red-skinned American boy keep his name as well as the foreign Hun or Pole?

Or, for that matter, why is one name preferable to another? Is there any more civilization or righteousness dormant in "Bill" and "Bob" than in the sonorous titles of the Omaha and Navajo?

A great Indian chief, the last of the Mohicans, was known as Uncas. The whites dubbed him Job Smith, and he sleeps now under a stone with that name upon it in the old Moravian graveyard at Bethlehem. What was gained by that christening?

The whole difficulty grows out of a curious belief cherished by every English-speaking man. It is that to be a civilized human being or a Christian you must not only believe but dress, speak and eat your dinner as he does.

The White Brothers going out to convert a heathen meet him as near to his own standing ground in life as they can. They adopt his language, his clothes, his customs. These, they hold, are only outside, unimportant matters. They seek to influence his soul and his principles of action.

We may not believe in their church nor its doctrines, but there is no doubt that they are the most successful missionaries in the world.

Bishop Coleridge Pattison, one of the foremost of modern Christian apostles, adopted these methods. He did not even urge civilized clothes upon his convert, provided his soul kept near to God.

"The South Sea Islander," he once said, "may sometimes be a cannibal, but he is always a gentleman; though, when he puts on English clothes," he slyly added, "he looks like a gent!"

Our ordinary method with the savage is to make him learn English whether he learns Christ or not.

What to Do With Your Vacation

BEFORE starting on vacation it will do no harm to ask yourself, How long did the good that last year's vacation did me outlive the brown of the tan on my skin?

A man goes off to recuperate. He returns looking well and feeling as well as he looks. The next thing you hear of him he's ailing or bedfast. And when you say, "Too much vacation?" he replies: "Oh, no—not at all. If I could live that life the year round I'd never be sick. It was the return to unhealthful conditions that knocked me out."

It may be so. But—the country sun is a great deceiver and the country air is a sly stimulant. Together they may have conspired to stave off the consequences of the fried food you loaded yourself down with three times a day and the water you drank from an impure well or spring. If you had stayed in the country two months instead of two weeks, you might have found the unscrupulous pair out, and they wouldn't have been able to stuff the blame to the "unhealthful conditions" of your working-place.

One way to defeat this precious pair is by being careful what you eat and drink on vacation. But that's a hard way, and the person who advised taking it would be thanked mighty surlily for his officiousness.

Prosperity that Kills

IN THE front rank of diseases that prey upon the human animal is a disease which we beg to "indicate," as the doctors say, under the name of Premature Prosperity.

Its ravening germs lurk in the gold or silver spoon wherewith some children's mouths are adorned when they are born. It fastens upon the precocious infant and often has him beyond all medicine before he has graduated from the high school. It sends its germs by the million to our colleges and to other places where our myriad promising youth are serving apprenticeship, and it has the promise eaten full of holes and curling at the edges before the first vote is cast. Such as escape it then it by no means despairs of. It swarms in early business and professional successes; it is malignant in large offers of salary or preferment in the twenties and early thirties. It has had some of the greatest triumphs in the forties when the arrogance of youth is battling with the cooler judgment of maturity. It seized upon Napoleon at Friedland and ten years later laid him low. It attached itself to Cæsar at Pharsalia and did for him in four years.

Let the youth who are unsheathing at this season in such numbers think on this dread disease, note its ravages, and beware.

The Talent in the Napkin

"AMERICA," said a visiting foreigner, "is a land where the men are sacrificed to the women and the men and the women to the children."

There is truth in this criticism, if criticism it was. No doubt "papa" manages to have a pretty good time withal; and as for "mamma," she is not miserable every moment that she is escorting the children about to places where they can enjoy themselves. But the fierce days of our pioneer ancestors have put their stamp upon us. Then everything was of necessity for the future—what was then in the present beside hardship but hope? And so we have the hereditary habit of sacrificing the present to the future.

Like every other habit, this in excess is a vice. And is there not, with many of us, too little recognition of the rights of the present? Do we not forget that each individual is here as the custodian of certain talents, certain potentialities, and that he or she can best serve others not by wrapping them in a napkin and burying them and permitting himself or herself to wink out as an individuality, but by bringing them to their full development?

This does not mean that papa ought to have a larger part of his earnings for drinks and cigars. Nor does it mean that mamma ought to spend more money in finery and more time in gadding and gossiping. It means that each owes it to future generations as well as to himself to develop his own intelligence and character. The best possible gift parents can give their children is the example and the memory of them as intelligent, independent, life-enjoying persons skilled in that high and rare art, the art of living. What could be worse for children than to see and to remember a father who was a mere breadwinner, a mother who was a mere household drudge?

Cleveland and the Fire-Eaters

WHAT is the cause of this extraordinary outburst of enthusiasm for Mr. Cleveland after a long period in which he was, to put it mildly, neglected?

It is deeper than party, deeper than politics. It is an indication of a reawakening of the people to admiration for the old-fashioned American characteristics which even most of his enemies concede that he embodies to an unusual degree. These United States are not inhabited, as so many of our public men have latterly shown themselves to believe, by a flamboyant, fire-eating, ostentatious, show-crazy and extravagant people. On the contrary, the mass of Americans are sober and sturdy, strong but peaceful and quiet, and they love peace and quiet and plainness. And they admire those qualities in a public man, and they find them in the retired statesman of Princeton and Buzzard's Bay.

Whether or no the "resurrection of Grover" has any political significance, its moral significance cannot be underestimated, especially by candidates for the Presidency.

The Geese and the Guinea-Pigs

A LONG list of the companies in which he is a director is a never-missing part of the biographical sketch of any man conspicuous in commerce and finance. It is not strange that a man of millions should have to scatter his investments and should insist upon having a directing say in the management of a property he is interested in. Nor is it strange that a company, wishing to appeal to that ever-widening body, the investing public, should seek the support his name is sure to give. But is it not strange that a man of hard-earned and high commercial reputation should be willing to lend his name to so many enterprises of which he knows nothing but what others tell him?

No man could possibly be a true director in twenty, thirty, forty large corporations. He believes that each is sound and well managed, and he invests his money on that belief. But if his investment were his whole fortune or any considerable part of it, would he be willing to put it into any one of those on his list of companies which he never really investigates from year's end to year's end? Yet, by giving his name to the directory he tempts scores of people to invest their all; they think that he is an actual director. Furthermore, in many of these companies he has, to him, but a trifling sum invested.

Among the many words which modern conditions have made it necessary to re-define, the word director stands not far from the head of the list. The old definition makes no mention either of the directors who don't direct at all or of the directors who plot to direct everything into their own pockets.

Every Man His Own Doctor

AT A CONVENTION of doctors in Washington, recently, the chairman said that there were too many doctors, too many schools for doctors, too much doctoring.

Just the reverse is the truth, if the matter be looked at a little more broadly. Every man should be a doctor; every school should be first of all a school of medicine; every one should be doctoring all the time.

But—Doctor should not mean a person engaged in putting unsightly patches upon the human machine; a school of medicine should not mean a place where common-sense is smothered in useless and even dangerous accumulations of more or less inaccurate observations on the surface symptoms of disease and on the methods of making those surface symptoms disappear; doctoring should not mean dosing with drugs that leave weakness and woe behind them in a dismal trail on their way to give disease a battle that, with its violence, shakes the very foundations of health.

If from earliest childhood we were taught and were got into the habit of practicing the only certain truths of medicine—that disease cannot fasten upon the body that is well aired, well carried, well fed with real food taken slowly and in moderation, well treated in the matter of regularity—if this millennium should arrive, such of the doctors as did not turn surgeons would seek employment as experts upon sanitation.

Disease is not a cause. It is an effect. Its best, its only true, doctor is Doctor Prevention.

The more savage the penalties of ignorance, the faster the spread of intelligence. The multiplication of bad professional doctors, shaking as it does blind public confidence in cures and professional curers, is not a cloud without traces of silver lining.

BUCKING THE HUDSON BAY COMPANY

Told by Captain John J. Healy
Written by Forrest Crissey

NO BOAT CAME

THE term "Free Trader" has an easy, go-as-you-please swing; but in the old pioneer days of the sixties and earlier it carried a meaning that can hardly be understood in these peaceful times. It meant war—and war to the knife! The man who started out to buck any of the big trading companies went against the stiffest kind of warfare that was to be found in the whole wilderness.

The stories of the men who went down would furnish the darkest page in all the pioneer history of the Northwest. Of course, all this has changed; but there are some experiences in the fights waged by "free" trappers and traders that stick in the memory of the men who went through them. I confess that, for one, I haven't forgotten the struggles of this sort, and I believe they should be given a place in the history of the old trading days. One of the toughest trips I ever made was in bucking the Hudson Bay Company, for it amounted to that before I wound up the experience.

That was in 1863, and I was then only twenty-three years old and had plenty to learn. Like all the traders and trappers in the Northwest States I listened to the tales of gold brought down by the Indians from the Dominion, and they tickled my ears. However, I was not the only white man whose head was turned by these rumors of how the Indians traded a gun barrel full of gold dust for a gun barrel full of powder. So I determined to cross the line and look for gold in the Fort Edmonton country.

Luck seemed to be on my side at the outset of the undertaking. There was no excitement on the trip north, and when I struck the district where I intended to prospect I stumbled on Brazos and Flet, two good men I had known on the Missouri. They were from Carondelet, the French settlement just below St. Louis. Brazos had been with the American Fur Company, but the Hudson Bay folks had induced him to bring his trade over to them about thirteen years before. Brazos gave me the best he had, and also told me the things I wished to know about the country.

"If you send any of your men up here," said he, "have them bring what they'll need in the way of food." That was as straight a hint as any one would need from the trader of a Hudson Bay post! But I thought I could make a rich strike in gold, and so I made my plans to go back and send up some of the men who were sure to be with me in any venture I should tackle.

"I'll not cross that hostile Blackfoot country," I told Brazos, "without rigging up to stand off the stiffest kind of an attack, and I'll come in condition to stick it out."

Then I started back to Fort Benton with a young half-breed Blackfoot as my only companion. He couldn't speak a word of English and I was about as helpless when it came to talking French. But he was keen as a knife, and we were both well up in the sign language. It was hard work to understand each other the first day or two out, but we were forced, by sheer necessity, to make rapid progress in that particular.

We each took two horses, so that we could always have a fresh animal and could push ahead at a lively swing, taking good care to keep away from the mountains. We couldn't dodge the rivers, however, and they were the coldest streams, it seemed to me, that I ever swam.

The first morning out, Piscan, or Buffalo Pound—as the half-breed was called—gave me evidence of his shrewdness. We had slept under the cover of some brush, and I started to crawl out to where the horses were without putting on my hat. Instantly, however, he picked it up and clapped it on my head. Then, by signs and words together, he explained that there were many Indians who would not kill a white man, but would shoot at sight an Indian of any tribe with which they were at war. To be seen bareheaded was to stand as an Indian, while a hat was always supposed to cover a white man. While Piscan was careful that I should not be caught with my hat off, he also took good care to have his own always on his head!

By screwing our vigilance up to the highest pitch and resorting to every precaution known to a mountaineer, we managed to slip through the fingers of the Blackfeet and reach St. Mary's River without mishap. After a hard ride of fifty miles we crossed St. Mary's River, near the lake. We changed horses frequently, and when they began to get fagged I would run behind, holding to the tail of the last one. Suddenly, after we had struck camp, the half-breed gave a grunt of surprise, pointed away across the river and exclaimed:

"We are going to be rubbed out!" Sure enough! There were six warriors, mounted in fine shape and coming for us at a clip that fairly tore up the ground.

"They are Kootenays," explained Piscan, "and I am a Blackfoot half-breed. They are at war with the Blackfeet and will surely kill me. You may get away with your hair."

"Don't get scared," I answered; "they'll not kill you while I'm alive, and we can make away with six of them all right." While saying this I figured out just what I would do if they showed fight. The half-breed had a double-barreled shotgun which would take care of two Kootenays, my rifle was good for another, and I was willing to take chances on wiping out the other three with my six-shooter. Before the band reached the river I heard a voice right behind us and a big buck leaped from his horse and shook hands with us. Then the others rode through the water with a rush. As they came up the bank I dropped to the ground, my hip on the stock of my rifle, and my right hand hold of my six-shooter, concealed under my coat. Piscan gave up at the start and made no preparation whatever for a fight.

Indeed we were providentially saved from coming to a fight. The chief of the band seemed more anxious to take the measure of the white man's cunning than of his scalp. Particularly did he show himself covetous of my favorite mare, and, after first trying to prove his ownership, commanded us to his teepee, in the hope, no doubt, of frightening or jockeying me out of my goods in some sharp deal. An Indian's teepee is as sacred to the rights of hospitality as an Arab's tent, and once in the shelter of the chief's protection we knew ourselves safe for the moment. It became a matter of some courage, however, at the end of our negotiations—throughout which I firmly insisted on every inch of my rights—to make the first step toward departure. I confidently expected that the long-deferred trouble would break the instant we attempted to saddle our horses.

Not a warrior stirred, however, and we were allowed to take our departure in peace. The outcome of the affair was certainly far different from what it promised to be when the Kootenay warriors were first sighted and came down upon us like a whirlwind; and I couldn't help thinking of this feature as we took the trail with our hair still safe on our heads. Shortly before sundown we suddenly stumbled upon another camp of four or five lodges. A glance showed me these were also Kootenays. The instant we were sighted the whole band came rushing out to meet us. They were apparently delighted to see us and made our welcome as friendly as they could by means of a mixture of broken English and French and a good command of the sign language. By words and gestures they said:

"Stay with us; the sun is low and you cannot travel far. We have just come from the mountains to hunt the buffalo." Somehow, I had an immediate confidence in this band, so we took off the elk meat and carried it into the lodge. When all our things were brought within the teepee a lot of bucks, several squaws and a horde of half-naked children gathered about us. Among the latter was the handsomest little Indian girl I have ever seen. In her hands was a small duck, uncooked and only partially skinned. Hiding behind her mother she set her white teeth into the raw flesh of the bird and began to eat it ravenously.

"What does this mean?" I asked Piscan. "These people must be almost starving. I never before saw a sight like that—never!"

"Yes, they are very hungry," answered the half-breed, "but this is Sunday and they will not hunt on the Sabbath, as they are good Catholics. They will starve before they will get out and hunt on Sunday."

Just then I heard a small bell sounding vespers. In one second all the Indians in the camp dropped to their knees and began praying and blessing each other.

I can never tell how that sight impressed me. I hung my head, and hung it low, too. Here were a lot of savages, out in the country of their enemies, hungry almost to starvation, but voluntarily denying themselves food because of their religious scruples! They were going through the holy ceremony, while I, who had been raised in the faith and brought up in civilization, did not even know that the day was the Sabbath. It was the most cutting rebuke I ever received.

As soon as prayers were concluded I called the people to the lodge and gave them the elk meat and told them we should have a grand feast. The rejoicing with which this news was received was the best kind of thanks.

In the morning, when I sent Piscan for the horses, the head man of the band came to me and said: "I am the white man's friend. You have a long journey and the country is bad. I will not let you go alone. I will go with you." This show of genuine friendship touched me, as the warrior had nothing to gain by it, and would have to make the return trip alone, at the peril of his life every rod of the way.

While swinging along down the valley of the Teton the Kootenay suddenly pulled his horse to a halt, leaped to the ground, dropped to his knees, gave one glance at the earth before him, and then began to count his beads and mutter his prayers as if he were going to be killed the next minute. The sweat actually stood out on his forehead in great drops.

"What's the trouble?" I asked.

"Oh, we are gone! A big party of Blackfeet is on us and we will be rubbed out."

"But I don't see any Indians," I replied.

"Here is their trail!" he exclaimed. "Our horses are tired and we cannot get away from them. They will rub us out and I shall not see my people again."

The half-breed was as badly scared as the Kootenay, and I tried to cheer them up by saying: "I've never been caught yet, and I'm not going to be now. Keep cool and we'll make the fort all right yet."

Leaping on their animals they plied the whips and started straight across the prairie, yelling to me to keep up. I knew their jaded horses could not stand such a pace, and so I took my time at an even, swinging gait. They were soon out of sight, but at nightfall I overtook them. The half-breed's horse was completely run out. Knowing that the Blackfeet would make short work of him if they overtook him—for he was considered as a sort of renegade from the tribe—I let him take my horse. For a little while we kept together and then I lost them. It was a wild, rough ride, and I couldn't help feeling that the chances were slim that we should all reach the fort.

After separating from them I stuck to the river and made my way as fast as I could under the circumstances. But I had to keep my eyes and ears on the strain to catch the slightest sign of danger. My food had given out and my pack animals were a constant drag. Although, just after dawn, I came across an antelope, I did not dare shoot for fear of attracting some prowling Blackfoot, but had to content myself with thinking what I should eat when I reached the fort.

Just after nightfall, as I was approaching Fort Benton, I heard the voice of Piscan. He and the Kootenay came out of their hiding and told me that they believed the fort was full of Blackfeet. Here was a fine mess! It looked as if our hot ride had gone for nothing. Still, there was a bare chance left to smuggle my friends inside and secrete them until the Blackfeet were gone.

A few thumps on the gate brought the guard who called out: "Who's there?"

"White man—Healy," I answered.

"Any one else?"

"Yes; a half-breed and a Kootenay. You sneak them into a room by the back way and I'll make it good. They're my friends, and those Blackfeet must not see them."

"Wait a minute," came the answer.

Inside there was a terrific pow-wow—singing, dancing, hooting and howling. And every yell made my friends shake and tremble with fear. Finally the guard spoke again:

"Come in quietly and follow me."

Then the gates of the fort swung open, our horses were taken in charge, and we crept softly to one of the rooms set aside for travelers. We closed the shutters and made them fast after ordering the best layout of food that the fort could afford. I thought I had seen Indians eat before, but Piscan and the Kootenay certainly broke the record that night and gorged themselves as if they never expected to get another mouthful. About noon the next day the Blackfeet cleared out and we were released from our prison. I never learned whether my Kootenay friend got back to his people in safety, but I suppose he did.

My father-in-law came to the fort and we determined to make up a party to go into the gold country I had left. Several good men joined us, and we built one of the strongest and biggest carts I have ever seen. Our harness had chains for tugs, and was made to stand the heaviest possible usage. We loaded it heavily with flour and other provisions, and the boys started out, with Piscan for guide. We were preparing for a long campaign, and had plenty of money to push the venture through. It was decided that I was to go back to civilization and get a lot of copper sheets rolled to save gold on, and was to join the boys the next season. When I finally returned to St. Paul with 2000 pounds of copper plate I found a letter which had been brought down from the Fort Edmonton country by Father Lacomb, a priest. It said: "Don't come back here. They are starving us out." Later, the men themselves came out and told me their story.

Just as soon as the boys struck the Hudson Bay post they slipped some gold out of their belts and went into the trading room to buy some things they needed. Their money was pushed back to them and they were told that they couldn't buy anything from the company. That meant they were suspected of being in the country for the purpose of trading instead of prospecting, and that war had been declared on them. A consultation was held and it was decided that the best course was to submit quietly to the hardships imposed by the company and try to convince the factor in charge that he was mistaken and that they had no intention to trade. They had seen too many men crushed out by the power of this great organization to act rashly in stirring up its animosity.

All their arguments and friendly talk were sneered at, and they were told that if they cared to chop wood for the company they would be given two pounds of pemmican for each cord cut. In other words, they might starve or accept this condition. It took mighty good self-control for high-spirited men to hold themselves in and swallow such an insult. However, they went at it with a determination to make the best of their situation until spring. But the work was hard, the weather terribly severe, and their food wholly insufficient. One after another of the party fell ill, and finally most of them became so weak they could hardly stand.

Time and again they appealed to the factor and begged him, in the name of common humanity, to sell them meat, coffee, tobacco and other necessaries for their sick. But these appeals were turned down in the most high-handed way. One day, however, when things looked their worst, the Scotch blood of Harley McEwen, who had been a partner of mine at Florence, Idaho, took fire. He looked the situation squarely in the face. There they were, sick and starving, when they had thousands of dollars in gold and were willing to pay any price for provisions. The company had plenty of food and everything else to sell to dirty Indians, but not a mouthful of anything for these good, honest white men! And they were obliged to work as slaves for a meagre amount of pemmican.

The outlook didn't please McEwen, and the more he thought it over the madder he became. When he could stand it no longer he snatched up his rifle, walked out to the company's field or yard, and shot down a big fat ox; then he cut its throat, dressed it, and took some of the choicest cuts in to the boys who were sick and starving. Before he had finished his job about fifty men who were quartered at the fort gathered about and took in the sight. They were in the employ of the company, and, of course, some of them carried the news to the factor in charge. The factor was king and his word was law—until he was in the company of a superior. Then he became a courtier!

In a few minutes word came that McEwen was to be brought into the presence of the factor.

"McEwen," said he, "I'm told you have been killing our cattle. What have you got to say for yourself?"

That struck Scotch fire in a second. His eyes blazed as he answered:

"You're right, sir; I did kill one of your cattle, and I meant to kill it, too. We have plenty of money but you will not sell us food; we have worked like slaves and tried to get along with you on your own terms, but you have still refused to treat us like men."

"You have come here under false pretenses," interrupted the factor. "Trade, and not prospecting, is what you are after. We don't want you here!"

"Oh, we know you don't!" answered McEwen; "but I tell you we are not trying to set up any competition to your company. Gold is all we're looking for, and we have nothing to do with any scheme to start competition against you."

"We don't want you around in this country," repeated the factor.

"Look here!" exclaimed the young Scotchman, raising the rifle he held in his hands. "Our boys are starving. I killed your ox for them, and by Heavens, I'll kill you, too!"

"Don't!" yelled the factor. "You can have anything—anything!" That old coward was white as the snow outside the fort, and I guess if he hadn't come to terms McEwen would have sent him after his ox. But of course there were enough company men at the fort to have cleaned the boys out entirely if the order had been given. But it wasn't, however. Instead, the traders were told to sell the men from the States anything they asked for and on the regular terms. Of course when things broke up in the spring the boys pulled out for Montana.

This affair put me on fire and I vowed that the minute I got $10,000 ahead I would go up into that country and make them abandon their fort if it was the last act of my life. From that time I lived and worked with that one object in view. Four years later I had made my pile and started in to put my plans through. There had been plenty of time for thought in the years I had been trading and prospecting and fighting for this end, and I had every move figured out to the letter. I had learned considerable more about Indians, too, and had gained their confidence and knew how to handle them.

In a quiet way I went among them, and before the company folks at the fort woke up to what was on foot I had every pound of meat in that whole country bought up. What we couldn't use ourselves we put to good purpose, and made great feasts for the Indians. When I knew that certain bands would either eat the meat or carry it out of the country, I loaded them down with it. But even this couldn't dispose of all that was bought, and the remainder was put down in the river to destroy it. As a result, the old "King" at the company fort had plenty of chance to remember how he had starved our boys. He stood the siege for a while and then the whole outfit sneaked back to another post and completely abandoned a fort that had cost them $30,000 (Mountain House). Well, it was war from that time forward! However, I had gained the entire trade of that whole region, and I held it until I was doing a good business and had a post that cost me $15,000.

Suddenly, one day, a cavalry force swooped down upon me. I welcomed the major and introduced myself. He was a tall fellow, and stood head and shoulders above me.

"What!" he exclaimed. "Are you the terrible man they have been telling me about? I thought you were bigger than a grizzly, carried more guns than a pirate, and had six hundred men and two or three batteries of cannon. That's what you have been pictured to the authorities!" Then he laughed until he was sore. The company had reported that I had captured two batteries from the United States and kept a regiment of five hundred men with which to intimidate the whole region. He had been sent out with a force large enough to do battle against a good big military fort. Well, instead of driving us out of the country the major became my best friend, and was annoyed at the absurd reports which had been circulated by the enemy I had routed. The next move of my enemies was to inform the Canadian Government that I had taken a steamboat load of rifles up into that country and was arming the Blackfeet. This complaint had been reported to our Government at Washington and General Lewis was sent to investigate. In short order I showed him that I bought a dozen rifles a year from "Tom" Powers, and that that was all. Well, that game didn't work. I stayed in the country from which I had driven the company until I was ready to leave of my own accord!

It isn't to be supposed that the Hudson Bay Company was the only offender. The same spirit of crushing and killing was in every one of them. When a man offended the company in power, his best course was to get out of the country and stay out. A favorite method followed by the big trading companies of the old days was that of sending a marked man, one who had given them offense, to some remote post and then cutting off his supplies. There were scores of these terrible tragedies. Take the case of Alexander C. de Bompard. He was one of the best traders his company had in California. He risked his life hundreds of times to swell the profits of the shareholders and served them as loyally and devotedly as if he owned the whole corporation.

One day some starving men came into his post. They had been lost in the mountains and were on their last legs. He asked them no questions, although he suspected they belonged to an opposition company or were free traders. All the supplies needed to save their lives were sold to them; they were given shelter and nursed back to life. Well, there was some spy at his post who furnished the company with information that Bompard had given food and shelter to men of the opposition and had saved their lives instead of allowing them to perish. When the dispatches came from headquarters at the opening of the next season he received orders to go to the most extreme and remote post in the whole service—a place where only tobacco, powder, shot, cotton shirts and things of that kind were traded for fox and marten skins. No meats were received for barter and the men at the post were supposed to live off the country for the main part—principally from fish and fowl. But, of course, life could not be sustained wholly from this source, and some amount of provisions, together with guns, ammunition and other supplies, were essential to keep the poor fellows alive. It took two years for an expedition, starting from the main depot of supplies, to reach this post. One expedition was dispatched each year and spent the winter at a post midway on the long journey.

Imagine what the annual arrival of the boats means to these miserable exiles! It brings them assurance that there is really a world beyond the awful prison of snows—a world where white men live! Then, greatest of all possibilities, there is the hope that the voyagers may bring orders calling them back to life. How poor Bompard did long for release from the living death to which he had been banished! He waited the arrival of the men with this one thing in mind.

At last the boats came, but they were light and without supplies for the post—only enough for the men themselves. The man in command of the expedition explained that the company wished to get the furs from that region into the market that year and had therefore sent the light boats ahead to get the furs. Those loaded with provisions were behind and would arrive before the season was over, in time to put the post in shape for the next winter. Week after week and month after month those men waited, but no boat came. None had been sent. The post had been struck off the supply list. This was Bompard's punishment for having given aid and shelter to an enemy. The winter came on early and in terrible severity. All the horrors of starvation were endured. One after another went down under the siege.

Finally Bompard, half crazed, and preferring to face death in the open, with a remote possibility of escape, rather than give up where he was, started out across that country. Of course he realized that he must keep clear of the company's posts, for there he would receive the fate of a deserter. He cast his whole hope on the friendship of the Indians. That trip of a starving man across eight hundred miles of barren wilderness, in the dead of an Arctic winter, was a miracle of endurance. He lived by his rifle, shooting the heads off ptarmigan or grouse. When he reached a place of safety he was more dead than alive.

That awful experience simply broke his heart. He could not speak of it—and would not! But his daughter was a neighbor of mine in Montana and told me of his terrible sufferings. He never got out from under the cloud that his starvation trip had put upon him. It haunted him the rest of his life. Bompard was a good man and a splendid mountaineer.

Then there was Harvey. He knew too much to suit the American company and left it. One night he tied up to the bank of the river, and his men went to sleep on the shore, leaving him in the boat. Next morning they found him with a big hole knocked in his skull with a tomahawk. He had been left for dead—but it took something more than that to snuff out Harvey! That man was a wonder. The men who supported him sent him to New York and had him operated upon. When he came back the men of the opposition—the old company he had been with—kept mighty clear of him.

In these days we hear much talk about "grinding" and "oppression" in business, but we must go back to the old trading days to know the meaning of that expression. And for one I am thankful that all that kind of thing is long past and gone, although the new way claims more victims, as the actors are protected by law.

Insect Friends and Foes—By Harold Bolce

EFFORTS will be made to induce Congress at its next session to appropriate a suitable sum for the employ of additional entomologists. Current discoveries are showing that a knowledge of insect life is of the utmost value to mankind.

To develop a new phase of the mosquito and yellow fever problem tests have just been completed that give assurance that the scourge of that malady can never again decimate population in any country, if the method of prevention disclosed by these experiments be adopted.

Scientists in South America advertised a few months ago for a number of young men, some of them to submit to inoculation by mosquitoes that had fed on yellow fever bacilli, the others to live for a season in unfumigated rooms in which yellow fever patients had died. Several applicants presented themselves for the ordeal in the interests of science. Those that submitted to the mosquito tests were bitten by certain varieties of this insect, the purpose being not to determine that these creatures carry the disease (for that had already been established), but to see if under proper conditions a mild form of yellow fever could not be conveyed, which would not be dangerous, and the influence of which would convert the convalescent into an immune. The experiments absolutely established the theory. A type of fever, which compares with yellow fever just as varioloid compares with smallpox, was developed in the patients, all of whom speedily recovered and were found to be immune, subsequent submission to fever-fed mosquitoes failing to produce even the slightest symptom of the malady.

The other applicants who lived in rooms replete with fever bacilli, and who even slept on infected beds, were thoroughly protected from mosquitoes of any sort. These men developed no indication of the disease. The scientists, therefore, are convinced that the disease is communicable only through the method of insect inoculation. Thus to protect soldiers or other men in tropical countries from the yellow fever, it will be necessary, physicians and entomologists say, simply to have the men bitten by mosquitoes under laboratory conditions. It is necessary that this be done scientifically, just as it is essential in vaccination that the proper vaccine be employed.

To rob the work of constructing the Panama Canal of much of the terrors of yellow fever, it is expected that the new system of prevention will be generally introduced there.

Eleven Million Species

A conservative estimate of the number of species of insects places them at no less than eleven million. Vast as the field is already, current explorations are almost daily adding bewildering numbers of new varieties to the classified lists. Entomologists find it necessary to confine their studies to one branch of the science.

In the National Museum, Dr. William H. Ashmead, Assistant Curator and one of the foremost entomologists of modern times, has been for more than twenty-eight years engaged in a special study of chalcid flies, an insect whose value to man cannot be overestimated. When introduced into regions dominated by insect pests, these chalcid flies devour by the million the eggs of caterpillars and similar destructive creatures. Many of these beneficent chalcids are microscopic in size, some of them being no bigger than the point of a pin. No match for noxious insects when once developed, they perform their economic service to the world by concentrating on insect eggs, and with benign instinct single out only those of harmful varieties.

To enable scientific workers to take advantage of the splendid part played by these almost invisible chalcids, Doctor Ashmead has been studying them for nearly thirty years. Watchmen in the Smithsonian Institution say that it is no uncommon thing to see the light in the laboratory, where he is at work, burning until two o'clock in the morning. As the result of his long years of study, Doctor Ashmead is about to publish, under the imprint of the Carnegie Museum at Pittsburg, an exhaustive work, the first complete treatise on the subject the world has known, although this insect is the first one mentioned in secular history, Herodotus referring to its having been found on fig trees in Smyrna. Doctor Ashmead and Doctor Howard are pioneers in the discovery of the importance of this insignificant-looking creature. These scientists find that the chalcids are immensely valuable, saving thousands of dollars annually to cotton growers by devouring eggs of insect enemies of that crop. Recently, when the cotton caterpillar threatened crops in several States, the introduction of the chalcid parasite, Trichogramma pretiosa, resulted in the destruction of ninety-five per cent. of the eggs of its prey. An interesting thing about this group of insects is that they pass through an entire generation in eight days, spending only two days in the egg stage, three days in the larval stage and three days in the pupal. This rapidity of growth to maturity and effectiveness is unparalleled in natural history, and will make it possible on short notice for entomologists to propagate them for service in districts where crops are threatened.

The value of historical knowledge even in special pursuits is exemplified by the secret in the discovery of the use of the chalcid flies in fig culture. It was accepted that Smyrna figs were the best in the world, but the secret of this superiority remained a mystery. The same variety tried in California failed to produce fruit of similar lusciousness. Doctors Howard and Ashmead began to investigate jointly. Knowing that Herodotus ages ago noticed this insect on Smyrna fig trees, the American scientists concluded that there was some relation between the presence of these diminutive flies and the superiority of the figs. Microscopic study showed that the chalcids are provided with a sawlike member. Introduced into California orchards it was discovered that with this infinitesimally small saw the chalcid cuts into the blossoming fig calyx and invigorates the budding fruit with pollen, the figs thus grown having a size and flavor far superior to the variety dependent upon ordinary conditions. Thus, with the coöperation of flies, which the farmer cannot see as they perform their labors, the fig raisers of California are now being enabled to compete with the figs grown in ancient Smyrna.

Doctor Ashmead has labored incessantly to secure adequate appropriation for the carrying on of insect study at the National Museum. Recently he sought to induce Congress to purchase the Hermann Strecker collection. "What good are they?" was the objection of an influential statesman. "You can't eat insects, and you can't plant them."

From many quarters, however, comes recognition of the far-reaching economic value of the patient entomologists serving the United States Government. Eminent students from all parts of the world are now consulting the Washington authorities. Japan, particularly, is obtaining valuable information from this source, and applying it.

Thirty-five years ago Dr. C. G. De Dalla Torre, a learned German professor, began a work entitled Catalogus Hymenopterorum, on which until a few months ago he has ever since been steadily laboring. It has just been published in ten enormous volumes, every one of which is as big as a gazetteer of the world, and all deal with a single order of insects, the Hymenoptera. This great work, representing the lifetime of a famous naturalist, bears on the title page a dedication to Dr. Leland O. Howard and Dr. William Harris Ashmead, of Washington.

A Scientist Who Gets No Salary

Over $3,000,000 was appropriated during the recent session of Congress to put up a great new building for the National Museum, but in that governmental institution is a scientist, an eminent authority on several orders of insects, who works wholly without pay, there being no appropriation out of which he can receive a salary. He reports for duty every morning at eight o'clock and works until late in the evening. Holidays also find him at his desk or at work in his laboratory. In addition to general work as an entomologist he enjoys special recognition as an authority on Lepidoptera. The study

"AUNTIES"

They Belong to the Whole Neighborhood.

That dear old neighbor we knew as "Aunty" and who lived down the street was no relation, of course, except that her tender old heart made her "Aunty" to all the young people. And how she did love the young mothers! One who remembers her says: "We could always depend on 'Aunty' for good, sound advice. She was particularly well informed on food and what to use for certain troubles. After having taught in the public schools for years my health became bad and I suffered frequently from indigestion. After my marriage I had indigestion so badly it became chronic. Owing to my condition my little baby did not get proper nourishment and was a very delicate child. I had about decided to put her on artificial food altogether when the advice of dear old 'Aunty' put baby and I on the right road.

"She insisted upon my trying Grape-Nuts food, declaring that it would help me and give baby more nourishment, so to please her I did, trying it for breakfast. The result was so marked and so quick that I ate it for luncheon too, and I must say the change has been wonderful. I have good health now and baby is a strong, active child.

"My mother says that Grape-Nuts helps her more and keeps her more cheerful and happy than anything else she has ever taken. Truly pure, scientific food has great power." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The housekeeper who reads the little recipe book in each package of Grape-Nuts is usually famous for her clever desserts.

Some Things Worth Knowing About Typewriters

IT IS about twenty-five years since the first writing machine made its appearance. A rather crude affair compared with the machine of to-day, and yet demonstrating a principle that has never been improved upon; this principle provided for a type basket, around which "basket" were assembled the type bars, in the ends of which were the type. By depressing a key the type bar swung towards the printing point and gravitation returned it to its normal position. This principle insures greater durability than can be secured in any other manner. This principle has to be sacrificed in all so-called sight writing machines and by any that do not have the "type basket." The other basket type machines with the exception of the Fox Typewriter use this same construction to-day. It remained for "THE FOX" to bring out the improvements named below.

Type Bar and Hanger

In the Fox Typewriter the basket was enlarged, allowing the use of a wider hanger, with a pivot having perfectly ground cone bearings, and the hanger by means of a simple screw adjustment was made adjustable, so as to admit of taking up the wear on the bearing even after years of service, always insuring perfect alignment, and uniting the durability secured in the "type basket" construction with perfect alignment at all times. This was really the first noteworthy advance in typewriter building.

Speed in typewriting is a great consideration, and yet an operator cannot be any faster than their machine. It used to be, and is yet, on all typewriters except "THE FOX," that if a machine was sent out with a regular escapement and was too slow for a fast operator, the escapement had to be changed by either a repairman or be sent to the factory. On the Fox Typewriter, by a very simple arrangement of the escapement dogs and by one motion of a small lever, the operator can instantly change the speed on the machine, from regular to reverse, and when set for "speed" the operator has not yet appeared who is fast enough to pile the letters. The Fox Typewriter will thus accommodate itself to any operator — an arrangement that is practically invaluable to an ambitious stenographer.

Showing Escapement

We have mentioned two valuable improvements — there are many others equally as important to the user of typewriters, which are found on the Fox Typewriter and not on any other. This is the reason "THE FOX" is displacing other makes of typewriters so rapidly. A comparative test of different machines, point for point and side by side, can lead to but one conclusion; for example, compare the ½ in. key dip of the Fox with that of other makes, all ⅘ to ⅞; the 2 oz. key tension on the Fox with that as high as 6 to 8 oz. on others, the rolling motion of the platen, the convenient arrangement of the keyboard, the margin stops, the line lock — all stand out on "THE FOX" in sharp contrast to the crude and antiquated methods employed in other machines.

We have a special book describing just where the Fox Typewriter excels other typewriters, which we will be glad to mail you on request. At the same time we will acquaint you with our FREE TRIAL PLAN, whereby any responsible firm or person can try "THE FOX" for ten days without incurring the slightest obligation.

of insects is of great economic importance, inasmuch as nearly all of them are either of positive benefit to human interests or working industriously against the health or prosperity of mankind.

The work, therefore, of this scientist, Dr. H. C. Dyar, who has studied the habits of millions of insects and classified them for the benefit of students, is of much value to the Government. Fortunately, he is a man of independent means. He is now getting ready to carry on field work for the United States Government in British Columbia. A part of that country abounds in mosquitoes of a peculiarly malignant type which Doctor Ashmead says have not been so thoroughly investigated as the current importance of mosquito study warrants. On this expedition Doctor Dyar will, as usual, defray his own expenses.

An Example of Scientific Enthusiasm

An interesting example of scientific enthusiasm is presented in the case of Dr. C. L. Marlatt, Assistant Chief of the Bureau of Entomology, who recently traced to its original habitat in Northern China the destructive San José scale and discovered its natural enemy. Congress allowed him only $1000 for the trip. The investigations, requiring long journeys through Asiatic countries, involved a financial outlay of $5000. The difference Doctor Marlatt paid out of his own pocket. Yet he was engaged on a work that means a saving of hundreds of thousands of dollars annually to the American horticultural interests, through the importation of the insect that wages successful warfare on the scale. "Doctor Marlatt had an idea, based upon scientific reasoning, that he could hunt down this alien and undesirable member of the family of Coccidæ to its native lair and there likewise discover its sworn foe," said an official interested in the subject. "The plan was proposed to Congress, and finally partial indorsement came in the form of an insufficient appropriation. But Doctor Marlatt was too much in earnest to put the trip aside, and so he spent his own money in carrying out his work. Such is the spirit of our Government scientists."

Current investigation of the habits of the white ant in the Philippines and elsewhere, with a view to checking the widespread ravages of that insect, calls attention to the great service rendered by one of the assistants in Doctor Howard's department in discovering the queen ant of this species, a marvelous creature that lays 80,000 eggs a day. This discovery was made by the late Dr. Henry G. Hubbard, a Yale man, and is one of the most striking facts in recent entomological research. For ages scientists had searched for the female of the white ant (Termes flavipes), or termites as they are generally called, the insect that builds immense clay citadels in many lands, from which colonies issue to work extensive damage upon buildings, libraries, the contents of warehouses and other valuables. The female or queen ant is now known to live in inaccessible chambers at great depth. Year after year ant hills were demolished and the contiguous region excavated, but no one succeeded in discovering a queen. Crafty instinct had prompted her to search out a hiding-place inaccessible to enemies. Entomologists throughout the world eagerly continued search for this exclusive and prolific queen. The discovery was to be Doctor Hubbard's.

The Discovery of the Hidden Queen

In the midst of his fine scientific achievements he was unhappily stricken with consumption, and in search of health went to the arid regions of Arizona. He was accompanied by Professor E. A. Schwarz, his lifelong friend and fellow-entomologist. The journey was in vain. As Doctor Hubbard lay dying he saw near the door of his tent a cavalcade of soldier and worker ants making hurried trips to a certain point. As the workers and soldiers of this family (which though called ants are not really ants at all, but of the order of Neuroptera and allied to dragon and May flies) are totally blind, Doctor Hubbard knew that their straight and swift trips were controlled by some dominating exigency. Suspecting that the queen ant was in the vicinity, Doctor Hubbard made a desperate effort to locate her. Dragging himself from his couch, the expiring scientist dug feverishly at the point where the blind soldiers were entering the ground. His labors were rewarded. In a few moments Doctor Schwarz, who had gone to fetch water, returned, and the dying naturalist, feebly holding a queen many hundred times the normal size of the white ant, gasped:

"See, Schwarz, at last, the queen of the Termes flavipes."

It was his final message to the world. "Enthusiasm like that, which not even the approach of death could subdue, is simply an illustration of the kind of service scientists are giving the Government," said the head of one of the departments at Washington.

Doctor Howard says that if some accident had set Doctor Hubbard down in the midst of the Sahara, his whole thought would have been not how he might escape, but rather what exceptional fortune had thus placed him in a region whose fauna had not been fully studied.

To the Army of Amateurs

Government entomologists are seeking to interest students in their science. Though nearly 1500 people in the United States and Canada are interested in insect study, the United States Government is singularly short of experts in all the various fields of research.

The rapidly growing interest in insect study, however, reassures the entomologists in charge that recruits in this scientific work will be forthcoming. Doctor Howard states that in addition to professional entomologists, he knows an insurance agent, a commercial traveler, a hotel clerk, a minister of the gospel, a keeper of a beer saloon, a portrait painter, a hardware merchant, a stonecutter, an iron founder, a carpenter and builder, a wholesale wine merchant, a lawyer, a chemist, an undertaker, a librarian, an army officer, a navy officer, and any number of physicians and teachers, who are vitally interested in the collection and study of insects.

The Government entomologists give much encouragement to students. Any one may send samples of insects to either the Agricultural Department or the National Museum and have them identified. Specimens are also loaned to students for microscopic study. In this way collectors throughout the world have been converted into enthusiastic correspondents of the Government bureaus, sending in thousands of rare specimens annually.

Dr. Leland O. Howard, Chief Entomologist of the Department of Agriculture, was asked if it were possible for any one to become proficient in entomology without beginning in early life. He replied that though it would seem to be necessary to begin in youth to cover so vast a field, it was nevertheless a fact that one of the best entomologists the world has known did not take up the science until he was nearly sixty. This was Dr. Benjamin D. Walsh, whose scientific career was meteoric. In his early manhood he was interested in classical literature, and even published works on the Greek texts. That was at Oxford. Then he suddenly abandoned letters, came to America and settled down in Illinois as a farmer. He developed exceptional ability both as a farmer and as a business man. In his fifty-ninth year he said to his wife that he believed they had all the money they needed, and that he had determined to retire from business. So he sold his farms and stock, and when he had wound up his affairs he had $100,000 in the bank.

A Novel Use for a Cork Leg

"What are you going to do now?" asked his wife.

"I intend to spend the remainder of my life studying insects," he replied.

His wife smiled and wondered if the conversion of his property into gold had not possibly affected her husband's mind.

"I am serious," he added. "I am thoroughly interested. You may think it foolish to undertake the study of science at my age, but Cato was eighty when he began the study of Greek."

Vast as is the field of entomology, this aged student so mastered its infinite details that he became an international authority on the subject and his writings are treasured and consulted to-day as classical contributions to that domain of science.

So absorbed was he in finding rare specimens that he got in the way of a train in Illinois, where he was State Entomologist, and was run over. While his leg was being amputated, from the shock of which he died, Doctor Walsh, replying to friends who sought to comfort him, said: "It's nothing; a cork leg will be of great convenience to me, for on it I can readily impale my specimens in the field."

The Wild Flower Society

SPECIAL efforts are being made this spring by The Wild Flower Preservation Society to convince the public, particularly that portion of it that enjoys country and suburban outings on Saturdays and Sundays, that unless immediate action be taken to protect the most interesting forms of plant life in America many of them are doomed to extermination.

Inasmuch as only a few people, even though willing to refrain from gathering threatened species, are able to identify species of wild flowers, the new movement includes a project to post in certain localities, and under glass, colored drawings and dried specimens of plants that are vanishing. With these guides will be displayed notices that the species thus exhibited are growing very scarce in that neighborhood and requesting that the public exercise moderation or even refrain altogether from gathering them. Teachers in public schools are being urged to exhibit to their classes specimens of threatened flowers.

In addition to this campaign of education, Dr. Frederick V. Coville, United States Government botanist; Dr. Charles Louis Pollard, in charge of the plant exhibit at the United States National Museum; Dr. D. T. MacDougal, of the New York Botanical Garden, and other eminent botanists, including those connected with leading universities, are interested in a lecture bureau course throughout the country for the purpose of freely extending knowledge on the subject. Miss Caroline Phelps Stokes and Miss Olivia Phelps Stokes, of New York City, are among the enthusiastic patrons of the movement.

There is little, if any, economic significance in the undertaking. The preservation of wild flowers is purely æsthetic. The promoters of the project say that if they could convince the public that any particular plant had commercial value, that species would be irretrievably doomed. The crusade, which is gathering great momentum, is thus wholly sentimental.

Nevertheless, widespread interest is being aroused this spring. Through the newspapers of Boston an appeal has been made to the public to refrain from purchasing the mayflower, which in former years has been sold in such abundance on the streets that it is threatened with extinction. To supply the Boston market the flowers of this species have been garnered from many neighboring States. Even the South has been invaded. At one time this flower bloomed abundantly in the suburbs of New York City, where it is now practically unknown.

Demand for ferns in Buffalo has almost exterminated two evergreen species in the vicinity of that city. At one time maidenhair fern was abundant on the Palisades between Fort Lee and Pleasant Valley. From several other counties of New York State this fern has been exterminated by men who dig it for the market. The Legislature of Connecticut has found it necessary to protect the Hartford fern by law.

On rocky hillsides in Bronx Park, New York, wild pinks manage still to bloom from Monday to Friday. On Saturday come the children who gather the tempting flowers wholesale, and the Sunday crowds complete the wide harvest. Every year these flowers are growing fewer and weaker. The rose-colored wild azalea is also doomed, and the great bird's-foot violet, which a generation ago grew resplendently on many Connecticut hillsides, has become extremely rare in some localities in that State.

The wild columbine, the sumach and holly, the fringed gentian, bluets, harebells and lobelias are among numerous other plants that are seriously menaced. From the vicinity of many cities the trailing arbutus has entirely disappeared.

One of the plants which has suffered the most is the laurel, levied upon in summer for its gay blossoms and at the Christmas season for its tempting greenery. In the vicinity of many cities it has been all but exterminated. As a singular contrast to the ruthless methods in America the promoters of this plant protection movement cite the case of children in an English village who, when they dig a Christmas tree, carefully plant it in a tub. After serving its holiday purpose the tree is carefully carried back to the woods and replanted.

Literary Folk
Their Ways and Their Work

JOHN BURROUGHS' FIRST JOB — How he secured it, with no recommendation but the Muses'.

¶ Early in the sixties, when Hugh McCulloch had just been appointed Comptroller of the Currency to organize the new department under the provisions of the National Bank act, there walked into his office, unannounced, one day, a stranger dressed in "store clothes" and wearing long hair.

"My name is Burroughs—John Burroughs," said the visitor. "I should like to have a position in your department."

"What do you know about banking?" asked the Comptroller, thinking that perhaps in the unique stranger might be discovered some genius of an actuary or accountant.

"Unhappily, nothing," replied the applicant.

"Who sent you here?"

"No one."

"Well, who's your Congressman; to whom can you refer me?"

"I know no Congressman."

"And you expected to get a Government position without qualification for the position and without indorsement or backing of any character?"

"I think I could learn office work here, and the salary would be a great help to me in my literary career."

"Oh, you're a writer, are you? What's your line? Poetry, perhaps?"

"I try to write poetry," confessed the visitor.

"Got any of it with you?" asked the Comptroller, now considerably amused. "If so, let's see it."

The poet-naturalist produced a song redolent of early spring. It treated of the chewink, the oven bird and the Carolina wren, with a dainty reference to forest violets and hepatica.

"This is great," commented the Comptroller; "it's right out of the woods."

"Which is more than can be said of the author," observed Mr. Burroughs, thinking of the world of finance which he was seeking to invade.

The Comptroller laughed. "And is this all you have in the way of credentials?"

"I have some more poems at home," was the bland and sincere reply.

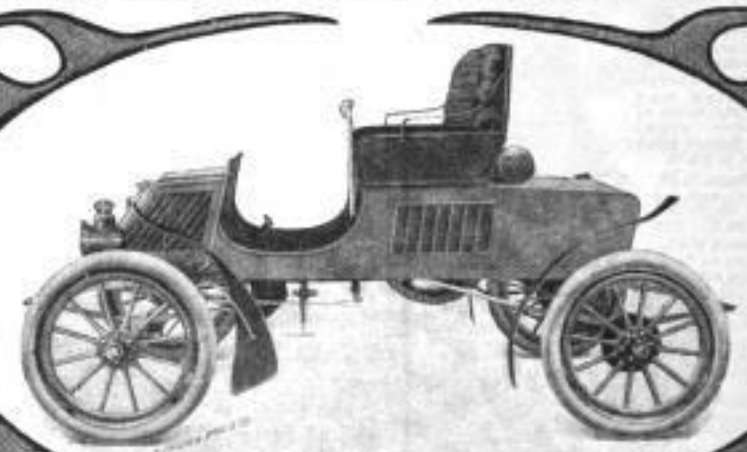
In much merriment the Comptroller summoned an assistant. "Here's the most astonishing instance of ingenuousness I have ever encountered in public life," said he. "That man over there applies for a Government position and the only backers that he can name are the Muses. Yet this department is not political, and somehow I'm inclined to put the fellow to work. I am captivated by the man's honest simplicity."

So John Burroughs was set to work as a Treasury clerk. No appointment ever before had been secured on such a basis and no one since has had the temerity, in asking for a Government job, to cite song birds and wild flowers as his only references.

Some of Mr. Burroughs' old colleagues are still in the Treasury service. In telling this story of his appointment, they dwell with emphasis upon the excellent work he did in the department, earning rapid promotions, and finally securing the responsible position of receiver for a failed national bank in New York, the affairs of which he settled satisfactorily both to the creditors and the Government.

Before starting West with the President recently, the naturalist called to see his old-time fellow-clerks who cherish memories of association with him.

"The circumstances of Mr. Burroughs' appointment," said one of his former colleagues, "furnish, I think, the most remarkable incident in the clerical annals of the United States. His personality won for him a position which, ordinarily, is obtained only by the persistent demands of influential backers."



A NOBLE FORTUNE-HUNTER — Mr. Phillips writes a satiric epic of this new Quest of the Golden Fleece.

¶ Good satire—and indeed much indifferent satire—always finds a ready audience. With irony the popular taste has another way. Irony is too doubtful, too difficult to puzzle out; and, if one did puzzle it out, after all, might not the letters horrify one by forming

THE REAL CRANK
Is Plainly Marked.

A crank is one who stays in beaten paths when common sense tells him to leave.

The real crank is one who persists in using coffee because accustomed to and yet knows it hurts him. It is this one who always pays the penalty, while the sensible person who gives up coffee and takes on Postum Food Coffee in its place enjoys all the benefits of returning health.

A well known manufacturer's agent of New York City visited the grocery department of one of the big New York stores not long ago and there he tasted a sample cup of Postum made the right way. He said afterwards: "Just through the energy of that young woman who was serving Postum there I became a convert to the food drink and gave up the drug drink coffee and got well.

"I had used coffee to excess and was gradually becoming a complete wreck, getting weaker and more nervous every day. I paid the penalty for using coffee and when I tasted the delicious Postum I was glad indeed to make the change.

"So I gave up the coffee altogether and have used Postum instead ever since. My family at first called me a crank but seeing how Postum benefited me the first month they all got in line and as a result of Postum's remarkable benefits to me we all drink it now entirely in place of coffee and we are well." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

into one's own name! Not so satire—satire is always the other fellow. It is safe to satirize the surgeon, the clubman, the janitor or the cook—any well-defined class—because every member of that class is always open-minded and perfectly willing to admit that the trade, of course, has its tricks and that clever dog What's-his-Name has hit 'em off uncommon well. Old Graveairs, round the corner there, for instance, he's got to the very life. How the old hypocrite must squirm! Himself? It never so much as enters his mind.

So that by one and the same turn of the key the door is opened and the company spirited away. Everybody welcomes the reformer, everybody listens to him gladly—and nobody applies the lesson. The admission of an intellectual truth and the acceptance by the heart of a principle of conduct are two very different things. Men continue to think with their heads and act by their hearts to-day very much as they did yesterday—and will to-morrow.

However, one might pervert such reasoning to the abandonment of all thought. Whereas, although thought and reason exercise very much less influence on conduct than one could desire, nevertheless they do beyond doubt exercise some influence, indirect though it may be, and in that proportion are valuable.

We of all people, who are the most self-conscious, the most sensitive to criticism, should be the most readily affected by the genial morality of satire. Our latest critic (native-born), Mr. David Graham Phillips, is particularly fortunate in his choice of a title. A noble English fortune-hunter is his hero, and what could be a happier description of his quest than Golden Fleece—however one looks at it? And Frothingham isn't half a bad fellow. An air of distinction he has, a way of compelling reluctant admiration—one fancies at times that even his creator shared in the compulsion—despite his cynicism, his debts and his well-bred ineffectiveness. He has shrewdness, too, and a touch of caustic wit that well becomes him in his inspection of American manners and morals. What he has to say is said after a good long look. He is, and should be, the foremost figure of interest in the book, though, selfishly speaking, he concerns the reader as he holds the mirror up to truth, not as he does it gracefully. New York, Boston, Washington and Chicago—the great cities, the centres of wealth—are naturally his hunting-ground. His ambiguous success is better told in the pages of the book than it can be here.

For yourself you may never have to consider seriously an "international" marriage, but whether you do or not you will find it very worth while reading about the preliminaries.

TWO ASTONISHED AUTHORS—Their publisher paid them twice what they expected.

¶ Apropos of the tendency to condensations of biographies, memoirs and histories, which doubtless may be construed as a sign of the times, a pleasant story is told. But first, in passing, it may be said that some of the examples chosen for this summary treatment have been singularly unfortunate. Parkman, the romantic and picturesque, has been taken in hand by Doctor Pelham and his twelve volumes condensed into one. If Parkman were of the mousing order of historians and a tabulator of detailed facts and statistics the task would bear a different aspect. But the vividness and zest of Parkman's narrative would seem to cry aloud against compression. Another example of "condensation," presented by the abridged edition of Nicolay and Hay's Life of Lincoln, explained itself more readily. The array of ponderous volumes in which this biography and history of Lincoln's times was first presented marked it as better adapted to consulting libraries than to the imperfect leisure of the average man of affairs. Even the portions published in The Century Magazine seemed almost painfully reluctant to come to a full stop. No one questioned the value of the work, but for most of us the value of time has a meaning which is not to be disregarded. There is a story that the authors of the Lincoln were wholly in the dark as to terms for serialization. They had an interview with the late Roswell Smith. He asked their terms and they expressed their uncertainty. Taking up an envelope he wrote five figures on the back and handed it to them, saying, "Is that satisfactory?" Inasmuch as the generous total was twice the amount which they had had vaguely in mind there was no difficulty in closing the arrangement, after their demur at the publisher's generosity was met by his assurance that he believed his offer justified.

The Reading Table

A Royal Accomplice

A LITTLE episode that did not get into the press, et pour cause, occurred during a recent visit of the King to Blenheim.

A crook who was well acquainted with the castle made up his mind to steal a valuable clock that he knew was in the King's bedroom.

He slipped in unperceived, at an hour when he knew the sovereign to be away, and coolly proceeded to take down the clock, which sat on a high mantel. He had scarcely mounted a chair that would enable him to reach it, however, when suddenly the door opened and who should appear but Edward himself.

For a second the thief gave himself up for lost, but soon his audacious nature took the upper hand and he turned to the King.

"A thousand pardons for my audacity, Your Majesty," he said with apparent dismay, "but this clock is very heavy; would Your Majesty deign to hold the chair lest I slip in getting it down?"

The King, persuaded that this must be a member of the household taking the clock for repairs, good-naturedly held the chair, and with profuse thanks and humble apologies the man disappeared.

Some hours later the King was notified that a clock was missing from his apartment and, as no trace of it could be found, it must have been stolen.

"Never mind," said he, smiling; "I was an accomplice to the theft; in fact, I held the chair for the thief, so better say nothing about it." And they didn't.

An Elastic Ambition

EVER since Lyman J. Gage, when Secretary of the Treasury, announced in a speech that a number of requests had been made him to recommend young men to fill positions paying $25,000 annually, the Treasury Department has been besieged by applications. The changes in personnel in that Department that are taking place under Secretary Shaw have stimulated many young men to apply for all grades of service, from the Collectorship of Ports to plain Treasury messenger. The fact that two assistant secretaries have risen from the position of messenger has made that office desired by many who believe they might do likewise.

All these instances of ambition are, of course, quite creditable, but there is an amusing side to some of the cases. Some of the young men, whose spelling and grammar betray a woeful lack of preparation, are not at all diffident in their eagerness to assume positions requiring great capacity and experience.

Some time ago a candidate who was manifestly unfitted for the portfolio sought to secure through the influence of the Secretary of the Treasury the post of United States Ambassador to one of the leading European Powers. Denied that, the applicant was "willing to accept" a consulship or a special Treasury commissionship abroad, but finally compromised on a modest clerkship in Washington. It is interesting, as a study in perseverance, to note that he actually got the latter position.

This attitude of seeking an exalted office, but with a willingness to accept anything that may be offered, is frequently met with among applicants.

"It reminds me," said the Secretary of the Treasury, "of a man I saw many years ago on the outskirts of a circus. He was selling suspenders. They were very short, doubtless designed for boys.

"'Here you are for suspenders. The latest and the best. Suspenders for boys,' he would say, exhibiting them at the normal size, and then, stretching them to the full capacity of the elastic, he would add, 'and just the thing for men.'" children. Such an assemblage of little folk he had seldom seen before. Coming to one doorway about which were clustered some dozen or more of children, the Senator stopped for a moment to chat with the comely woman leaning upon the gate. She was presumed by Mr. Cockrell to be the mother of all the tots gathered about her. So, politely doffing his hat, the Senator inquired:

"Madam, I may kiss these beautiful children, may I not?"

"Certainly," replied the lady.

When he had finished his wholesale contract the Senator turned to the attractive woman at the gate and said:

"Seldom have I seen lovelier children. Yours, madam?"

The woman blushed deeply.

"Ah, of course they are," gallantly suggested Mr. Cockrell. "The little treasures, from whom else could they have inherited those limpid eyes, those rosy cheeks, those profuse curls, those comely figures and those musical voices?"

But still the lady blushed.

"By the way, madam," concluded the Senator, "may I impose upon your good nature to the extent of asking that you tell your estimable husband that Senator Cockrell called upon him this afternoon?"

"Excuse me, sir," said the woman, "I have no husband."

"But these children, madam—surely you are not a widow?"

"I fear there's some mistake, sir. This is an orphan asylum."

Greatness Thrust Upon Him

AN INTERESTING story is told in regard to Dr. Samuel McCune Lindsay, Commissioner of Education for Porto Rico, who has just introduced in the Executive Council of that island a bill establishing a Porto Rican University.

It seems that notwithstanding his pronounced success there Doctor Lindsay accepted his appointment to Porto Rico under protest and regarded the post as a place of exile. During his connection with the University of Pennsylvania Professor Lindsay was favorably known personally and as a publicist by both President McKinley and President Roosevelt. The Professor had interested himself in creating sentiment in favor of a Department of Commerce, and made it known to President Roosevelt that he should like to become Assistant Secretary of that Department. It was with great elation, therefore, that he hastened from Philadelphia to the White House one day in response to an invitation by telegraph.

"Glad to meet you again, Doctor Lindsay," said the President warmly. "I've decided to give you the appointment."

The Professor began to return thanks.

"Not at all, not at all," said the President. "I realize it will be somewhat of a sacrifice for you."

The Professor, who looked upon the Assistant Secretaryship which he had in mind as an advancement, was amazed at the President's point of view.

"It will be new work and hard work, but you're just the man to make a big success of it. When can you start?"

"Whenever you're ready for me to go ahead with the work," responded Doctor Lindsay, unaware that he was pledging himself to go to the West Indies.

"Good," said the President; "we'll consider that settled."

Before he reached the street Doctor Lindsay discovered that he had been appointed Commissioner of Education for Porto Rico. He tried to see the President again to enter emphatic protest. He felt as if he were being summarily deported. But Mr. Roosevelt was extremely busy, and the long wait gave the Professor a chance to cool down and consult his friends. Though they agreed with him that to go to Porto Rico seemed to be to abandon all his plans for success, they pointed out that he had accepted the appointment and even thanked the President for it, and that it would never do to refuse the position.

Thus, rebelling against his fate, the Professor sailed for the island. Once there he set to work with great enthusiasm, and the project for the University of Porto Rico is one of the results of his endeavors.

CANFIELD BRAKE CO., Corning, N. Y.

Columbia University during the past month. After speaking briefly of the general nature of the litigation brought before the august body at the head of which he presides, he recalled several of his early experiences as a practicing lawyer. There was one point in his remarks that seemed to make a uniformly strong impression on all that large audience of men, for continued applause followed the narration of the incident.

When Judge Parker—then Mr. Parker—argued his first case before the Court of Appeals, he was prepared to talk for an hour in elaborate fashion. He believed that a shorter argument would be of little effect with the court. When, however, he appeared before the seven dispensers of justice he was seized with stage fright and for a minute or two could say nothing. The judges were entering the case in their books, and Chief Justice Church, glancing up, noticed the embarrassment of the young lawyer. He laid down his pen, looked kindly at the unnerved youth and bade him proceed with his case. Then Mr. Parker seemed lifted out of himself and, instead of the long introduction he had planned, he blurted out, "Your Honor, this is the point"—and for twenty minutes the point and the point alone was argued. The next day the decision was announced and Mr. Parker had won the case.

Therein lay his success—in the ability to get at the point and impress the point upon those who were there to judge. He quickly realized the futility of a verbose harangue and the importance of pithy brevity came over him like a flash.

We waste much time and many words in adorned argument and verbal pyrotechnics. We often use a paragraph where a sentence will adequately and forcefully convey the thought and impress it upon the hearer. A little experience will prove to one that as brevity is the soul of wit, so is it the very marrow of conviction.

MARLIN REPEATING SHOTGUN

MORE care should be exercised and more thought given the selection of a gun than any other article money buys. Fewer accidents happen with Marlin guns than with any other make. This is particularly true of Marlin Grade "B," which is not only a general favorite, but a special favorite of trap shooters. They say that it is superior to other makes because it is reliable, quick of action, simple and easy to operate and has one-third less parts than any other gun. It has a solid top and side ejector and throws the empty shells away from, instead of into the shooter's face. The barrels are made of the highest grade of "Special Smokeless Barrel Steel," equal in quality to barrels for which many makers charge more than our price for the entire gun. The Marlin Handbook tells how to care for and how to use firearms. This valuable book free if you will send stamps for postage to

Personally Conducted

"I think you may safely leave that to me, Elizabeth."

Really he was too much when he was smoking! She gathered up her work things and walked into the cottage.

He finished his pipe, rose, and then began to move slowly clubward.

In the first twenty steps he met Miss Portia. Now this was opportune. He could have a few preliminary words with her!

He turned. "Hem — Portia!"

"Yes, father."

"I think you've been acting — ah — a trifle unwarrantedly — a trifle injudiciously of late — about Percy — Mr. Johnston, you know ——"

She shook her head. "I'm sorry, father, but that is something it can be of no use for us to talk about. If you could possibly understand ——"

"Well? Well? I wish you to know that I am now going down to the club — and I intend asking him to come back to the cottage with me!"

"I'm afraid that he would hardly feel himself welcome — after ——"

"Well?"

"I think — I think you should have apologized to him. It's his right! And he — he must know that, too!"

"Really, my girl, really! I think you give yourself a great deal of liberty of speech — of license, indeed! And as for your conduct during this present week ——"

"Well, if — if I have ——" She was already groping hysterically at her bosom for her handkerchief. "Who was it forced me — me to do it — to — to make up to him for — for ——"

"Portia, girl ——"

"Well, you did! After pretending — pretending you liked him so much — almost from the first day he met me — you've been just as unkind — and cruel — like a death's-head to all of us — refusing to see him half the time and — and ——"

"Daughter!"

"I will speak out now, I will! I — I'd have gone to you if — if you'd shown any feeling for me! But now I'll just have to act — act toward Mr. Johnston as seems best to — to myself."

"Very well!" roared the Judge — "very well! But I feel compelled to tell you, my girl — that everybody — and I merely take the phrase from your mother's lips — will say that you are simply throwing yourself at him!"

It was enough — a thousand times more than enough! "Mother — said — that!" Her sobs rose up in one choking gulp. "But I knew it! I knew it! You're all against me!"

"Now — now — now! She did not say ——"

"Oh, don't talk to me," she wailed, and pushed her way toward the cottage.

The Judge charged on through the cedars in a blind fury. It will be remembered that he intended going over to look up Percy at the club. Now, automatically, he continued on his way. He had got no farther than his own boathouse when he came glaring upon the young man face to face.

Now Mr. Percy, be it also remembered, had come to the Judge desiring to have things flung at him. And he stopped squarely in his path. "Look here, sir," he said, "I'd like to know if you have anything you want to say to me?"

"Say to you? Anything I want to say to you?" So he did expect an apology! Nay, the young sprig was demanding it — was coolly holding him up for it! "Say to you? Say to you? I've just this to say to you, that I'll stand no more from you! That I consider your behavior is — is — you'll come to the cottage — or — I tell you that you've been acting in a way that's scandalous, sir, scandalous — nothing short of scoundrelly!"

They were standing in front of the boathouse which, at the foot of the bank, exactly faced the left wing of The Cedars; and it was a sounding-board which sent the Judge's words directly into Miss Portia's fair upper chamber.

At the last of them she rose straight up from the pink silk comforter, now alas! more grief-marked than ever. "Oh! Oh! Oh! I'll walk right out of the house! How could he? I'll not stay here a day longer! And when Mr. Johnston had just spoken so nobly — so forgivingly about him, too!"

It was the ominous loudness of the Judge's language — and the imp of the untimely — which led Mrs. Morris to choose this particular moment to seek her tortured offspring for an understanding!

Not that the girl was now showing any violence of emotion. As she stood before her mirror swiftly putting up her hair, her attitude was the frozen calm of final tragedy.

"Don't speak to me, mother," she said, waving a hand wearily.

"Portia, I want you to feel in this matter that I am your dearest friend."

"Oh, it's too late to say that, now! Yesterday I could have believed it—or even half an hour ago!"

"Portia! What do you mean?" Mrs. Morris wished that the girl had been ten years younger so that she might have grasped and shaken her. "But I shall have no more talk with you! Either you will give me your word to see Mr. Johnston hereafter only about the cottage, or we pack up for the city, Monday! I've been patient and taken your part for altogether too long!"

"Yes!"—with a laugh from a hundred fifth acts—"after telling father that I was simply throwing myself at him!"

Mrs. Morris let herself down on the pink silk comforter. "Do you tell me—that—the—Judge—said—that?"

"Yes, and I know it's true, too, by the way he—he let it out!"

"All right, Portia, I'll say nothing more just now—to you!" But as she left the room, with skirts swirling after her, it was not hard to guess whom she would have something more to say to. Five minutes later Portia was breathlessly crossing the "plaza" through the dusk.

Her hurrying figure was recognized by a sorely wounded young man at a window of the clubhouse reading-room. He hastened to join her. She poured the balm of her tearful loveliness upon him, and half unconsciously they took the way to Lovers' Walk.

"Mr. Johnston," she cried, when once they were within its moonlit shadows, "I heard all that father said, and I just want to say that the more he hates you and is cruel, and—so unjust to you—the more it makes me respect and feel for you—and—and"—she swallowed a sob—"and both he and mother said all they could to me, too, to-night. But I don't care if you—if you——"

He rose to it with husky rapture. "Oh, Miss Morris—Portia! You know how I feel—how much I—how much I care for you——" He foundered, but labored on again. "You're the only person in the world——"

"I—I know," she said, and with more assuaging sobs, dropped to his shoulder. . . .

"I think," she murmured, after a time, "I think as long as you have one true friend, even if one's father—and mother—are against you, it doesn't seem to matter!"

"Yes, it only seems to—to draw people more together." And most decidedly, something had!

That part of the proceedings having been very satisfyingly settled, Miss Portia straightened herself up, dried her eyes and donned the mantle of the businesslike in a way that considerably astonished the bliss-engulfed young man.

"Now, we mustn't lose any time," she said intensely; "we'd better take a boat and go out on the lake, so we can decide what to do!"

He fetched around his skiff. They pushed off, both very silent and deep in thought.

"I'm afraid," he anxiously suggested, after a time, "that it is going to be awfully hard pulling to get the Judge's consent."

"Oh—that!" She put it altogether aside. "That's something we'll never get until—until——" She began to weep again, but it was less with regret than wrath. "They're going to take me away Monday, and they'll keep you from ever seeing me again—if they can. . . . Don't you—don't you see that we'll just have to go ahead—before they do?"

Mr. Johnston was staggered. "But, my aunt! you know——"

She looked at him. "Why, if you don't want me enough——"

"Oh, I do!" he cried. "Only I thought, maybe—it's pretty sudden, you know, so to speak. You think we'd better run away—elope?"

"Why, what else can we do? And there's the Tourist Express going through at ten-thirty. We could paddle across the lake and take it at the junction. It's too late to-night, but we've got to-morrow, Sunday, yet!"

Percy put down the oars and rubbed a perspiring forehead. "Well, but don't you think, first, that it'd be only wise for me to make some attempt to talk to the Judge again?"

"'Attempt to talk to him again?' Why, can't you see—can't you see, that every day he's just twice as bad as he was the day before? And now that mother's—that mother's ——" She sobbed again. "Well, they've only themselves to blame! They've just driven us to it!"

The "us" decided him.

V

SUNDAY opened very warm. Miss Portia did not appear for breakfast. But her jaded elders saw Helga carry a tray upstairs without any word of comment. Enough that between them was the understanding that they would be leaving The Cedars on the morrow.

They heard the girl moving about above them, but she did not come down for luncheon, nor even for the five-o'clock supper.

While they were still glooming over the dessert some of the people from the Lake End called in to remind them they had promised to attend the evening service at Luna Cove.

They gazed at each other questioningly. Both wanted only to be left alone. But Portia knew they had promised to go; and now, if she had heard the Lake Enders reminding them, and heard them refuse, she might think they were staying to spy upon her. They weakly went.

And indeed, that sign of trust did strike a new pang into the harassed heart of the insurgent damsel. But nevertheless, she went on with the packing of her suitcase. And at half-past eight—the house being now completely deserted—she fastened in her painted china hatpins for the last time. She grasped the suitcase, made her way downstairs and through the side-door riverward. Her eyes were upon a big cluster of alders.

Behind it, Mr. Percy Johnston had been sitting in his Peterboro for the last half-hour, mopping at the back of his neck and struggling with emotions "in bunches"—as he would have expressed it. Possibly predominating in those bunches—though quite anomalously so—was anger against this general desertion of the camp which had made their project so contemptibly easy. He wanted a little more of the Lochinvar in his. He wanted opposition—and regiments of it. And also, from the depths of his imperishable youth there kept coming up a feeling that there would be a hoodoo on the business somehow, because they were pulling it off on a Sunday! But once more he put all weakling reconsiderations behind him. If it could not safely be left to Portia—if that girl's instincts were not divine——! . . . In another half minute he had handed her into the bow, and they had started.

About nine o'clock there smote all the woods and waters of the "Steel City Preserve" a storm which came little short of being a cloud-burst. Five minutes later a "tenter" over at Alder Point suddenly rushed out into the lashing rain and across to Commodore Hickson's veranda. "There's something bottom up away out in the middle—and some one clinging to it, too!"

The Commodore was already heading the race for his launch. "Where are the eyes of the Club people? Are they all asleep—or struck by lightning?"

However, the Alder Pointers arrived in time. . . .

Some half an hour afterward a final scene was taking place at The Cedars. The original four had parts in it—the two white and staggered elders, who had just got back from evening service, and a brace of young people—the wettest that ever soaked the Japanese matting of a cottage drawing-room.

"And you can't refuse now, father!" Miss Portia was crying—she was still somewhat hysterical, as her locks still hung weedily about her temples—"after my losing everything I ever cared for in that suitcase—and—and Mr. Johnston saving my life, too!"

No, of a truth there was no longer any place for the ferocious rôle of "tyrannwater!" And a blessing, no less binding if most inarticulate, allowed the tortured lovers to part in joy and seek dry clothes.

Percy, however, was accompanied to the clubhouse by flippancies from the other Steel City youth, which, at such a juncture, he felt were in the worst possible taste.

"Oh, no doubt it's funny," he said. "No doubt it's mighty funny! But for my part I don't think you showed up particularly well in this business. While you were all four-flushing over at church, we might very well have been drowned!"

And, sitting on a soap-box in his boathouse, the Judge had taken a solid grip on his jaws and chin and was rapidly emulsifying his gray matter in an attempt to figure out just where he was at in the affair now so happily concluded.

The Call of the Wild

François' whip snapped less frequently, and Perrault even honored Buck by lifting up his feet and carefully examining them.

It was a hard day's run, up the Cañon, through Sheep Camp, past the Scales and the timber-line, across glaciers and snowdrifts hundreds of feet deep, and over the great Chilcoot Divide which stands between the salt water and the fresh and guards forbiddingly the sad and lonely North. They made good time down the chain of lakes which fill the craters of extinct volcanoes, and late that night pulled into the huge camp at the head of Lake Bennett, where thousands of gold-seekers were building boats against the break-up of the ice in the spring. Buck made his hole in the snow and slept the sleep of the exhausted just, but all too early was routed out in the cold darkness and harnessed with his mates to the sled.

That day the trail was packed and they made forty miles; but the next day, and for many days to follow, they broke their own trail, worked harder, and made poorer time. As a rule, Perrault traveled ahead of the team, packing the snow with webbed shoes to make it easier for them. François, guiding the sled at the gee-pole, sometimes exchanged places with him, but not often. Perrault was in a hurry, and he prided himself on his knowledge of ice, a knowledge indispensable, for the fall ice was very thin, and where there was swift water there was no ice at all.

Day after day, for days unending, Buck toiled in the traces. Always they broke camp in the dark, and the first gray of dawn found them hitting the trail with fresh miles reeled off behind them. And always they pitched camp after dark, eating their bit of fish and crawling to sleep into the snow. Buck was ravenous. The pound and a half of sun-dried salmon, which was his ration for each day, seemed to go nowhere. He never had enough, and suffered from perpetual hunger yearnings. Yet the other dogs, because they weighed less and were born to the life, received a pound only of the fish, and managed to keep in good condition.

He swiftly lost the fastidiousness which had characterized his old life. A dainty eater, he found that his mates, finishing first, robbed him of his unfinished ration. There was no defending it. While he was fighting off two or three it was disappearing down the throats of the others. To remedy this he ate as fast as they; and, so greatly did hunger compel him, he was not above taking what did not belong to him. He watched and learned. When he saw Pike, one of the new dogs, a clever malingerer and thief, slyly steal a slice of bacon when Perrault's back was turned, he duplicated the performance the following day, getting away with the whole chunk. A great uproar was raised, but he was unsuspected, while Dub, an awkward blunderer who was always getting caught, was punished for Buck's misdeed.

This first theft marked Buck as fit to survive in the hostile Northland environment. It marked his adaptability, his capacity to adjust himself to changing conditions, the lack of which would have meant swift and terrible death. It marked, further, the decay or going to pieces of his moral nature, a vain thing and a handicap in the ruthless struggle for existence. It was all well enough in the Southland, under the law of love and fellowship, to respect private property and personal feelings; but in the Northland, under the law of club and fang, whoso took such things into account was a fool, and in so far as he observed them he would fail to prosper.

Not that Buck reasoned it out. He was fit, that was all, and unconsciously he accommodated himself to the new mode of life. All his days, no matter what the odds, he had never run from a fight. But the club of the man in the red sweater had beaten into him a more fundamental and primitive code. Civilized, he could have died for a moral consideration, say the defense of Judge Miller's riding-whip; but the completeness of his decivilization was now evidenced by his ability to flee from the defense of a moral consideration and so save his hide. He did not steal for joy of it, but because of the clamor of his stomach. He did not rob openly, but stole secretly and cunningly, out of respect for club and fang. In short, the things he did were done because it was easier to do them than not to do them.

His development (or retrogression) was rapid. His muscles became hard as iron,

MITCHELL'S DIAMOND STORES
56 N. 8th Street and 37 S. 8th Street, Philadelphia and he grew callous to all ordinary pain. He achieved an internal as well as external economy. He could eat anything, no matter how loathsome or indigestible; and, once eaten, the juices of his stomach extracted the last least particle of nutriment, and his blood carried it to the farthest reaches of his body, building it into the toughest and stoutest of tissues. Sight and scent became remarkably keen, while his hearing developed such acuteness that in his sleep he heard the faintest sound and knew whether it heralded peace or peril. He learned to bite the ice out with his teeth when it collected between his toes; and when he was thirsty and there was a thick scum of ice over the water-hole, he would break it by rearing and striking it with stiff forelegs. His most conspicuous trait was an ability to scent the wind and forecast it a night in advance. No matter how breathless the air when he dug his nest by tree or bank, the wind that later blew inevitably found him to leeward, sheltered and snug.

And not only did he learn by experience, but instincts long dead became alive again. The domesticated generations fell from him. In vague ways he remembered back to the youth of the breed, to the time the wild-dogs ranged in packs through the primeval forest and killed their meat as they ran it down. It was no task for him to learn to fight with cut and slash and the quick wolf-snap. In this manner had fought forgotten ancestors. They quickened the old life within him, and the old tricks which they had stamped into the heredity of the breed were his tricks. They came to him without effort or discovery, as though they had been his always. And when, on the still, cold nights, he pointed his nose at a star and howled long and wolflike, it was his ancestors, dead and dust, pointing nose at star and howling down through the centuries and through him. And his cadences were their cadences, the cadences which voiced their woe and what to them was the meaning of the stillness, and the cold, and dark.

Thus, as token of what a puppet thing life is, the ancient song surged through him and he came into his own again, and he came because men had found a yellow metal in the North, and because Manuel was a gardener's helper whose wages did not lap over the needs of his wife and the divers small copies of Jim-self which he had managed to accumulate.

The "Drummer" vs. the "Bagman"

By James L. Ford

IN NO respect is the contrast between English leisure and conservatism and the restless energy of our own country more sharply emphasized than in the methods and customs of the commercial travelers of both countries. This difference is indicated to a certain extent by the colloquial term employed in each country to characterize the calling of the traveling salesman. In England he is a bagman and in America a drummer. The one goes about with a bag full of samples of goods which he offers to the regular customers of his house, while the drummer is essentially a man who talks up the merits of his goods to new customers. To a certain extent, therefore, the bagman is a passive agent of trade and the drummer an active one.

In both countries the commercial travelers flock together in great hordes, but in England, where the rivalry is less keen than here and the segregation of classes a national trait, there is a social cohesion that is unknown here.

There is, of course, a certain cohesion among American drummers, too, and it manifests itself not only in the genial groups that fill the smoking-cars and hotel lobbies with their laughter, but also in the benevolent and protective associations in which the greater part of them are enrolled. They meet one another on the trains, frequent the same hotels and sell to the same customers, but they work at such high pressure and are so intent on "making" as many towns as possible each week that they do not allow themselves the hours of leisure that every Englishman, no matter whether he be a landed proprietor or a bagman, always devotes to his meals. And it is in their respective methods of dining that the real difference between the bagman and the drummer shows itself.

The drummer eats his dinner in a room of enormous proportions, for there is not a hotel in any provincial city in America that does not boast a dining-room large enough to seat twice as many people as the hostelry can accommodate. The colored head waiter who escorts him with stately tread from the door to his table is always provided with a pair of long legs, for he walks fully forty miles a day. This major domo has a memory for faces that enables him to recall at once where the drummer sat at the last meal and place him on the opposite side of the room. It is contrary to the rules of the hotel for a transient guest to occupy the same seat twice in succession, and the head waiter is always anxious to keep his job. At table the drummer may find himself in company with other drummers or in juxtaposition to a small family party, with a circus advance agent, an Indian doctor, and a soubrette thrown in by the head waiter for good measure. A bill-of-fare arranged in eight courses is placed before him, and after a hasty inspection he says to the waiter: "Gimme some of that consommé, and mind you have it hot. Then I'll have some shad if there's any roe with it, and if not, some salmon. You can fetch along some sweetbread, too, and be quick with it all, for I've got to catch the two o'clock train."

After finishing the sweetbread he orders roast chicken and what the waiter calls an "assortment of vegetables," meaning half a dozen dabs of squash, stewed tomatoes, turnips and mashed potatoes, in separate saucers. These are followed by snow pudding, lemon pie, a banana, a piece of cheese and a small cup of coffee, and within twenty minutes from the moment of sitting down the entire meal is finished.

Very different, indeed, is the meal of the English bagman, which is consumed in the "commercial" room of the inn, a place set apart exclusively for himself and his kind and into which no person not actually engaged in the business of selling goods by sample would presume to intrude. As the hour for the meal draws near the bagmen assemble to exchange greetings with one another and enjoy a few social moments before sitting down at the table. There is no hurry, no looking at watches, no fear of losing a customer and, above all, no anxiety to be off, for though time and tide may wait for no man, the entire commerce of England must wait on the digestion of her bagmen.

"Of course you'll take the chair to-day, Mr. Hotspur," says young Mr. Grigsby, who is making his first trip in paints and oils, to the white-haired and ruddy-cheeked veteran who has been selling woolen cloths for the past forty years and is known and respected in every commercial room in the three kingdoms.

"My dear boy," says the old traveler, who is none the less flattered by the suggestion, "I couldn't think of it for a moment while Brother Billings is in the room."

"But you must!" exclaims Brother Billings, who sells woolens for a rival house and is punctilious in his courtesy to the oldest traveler in his line. "I assure you that none other but yourself can be even considered to-day."

"As you will, then, Mr. Billings, but I insist upon it that you shall be my vice."

"If you say so," rejoins the younger man.

And a moment later, when dinner is announced, they seat themselves at either end of the long table, Mr. Hotspur at the head and Mr. Billings at the foot. The dinner, which is the regular "ordinary" of the inn, is consumed slowly and to the accompaniment of general conversation, for Englishmen are talkative when herded together with others of precisely their own kind. Unlike the drummer who drinks only water, or occasionally tea or coffee, with his dinner, no matter how much he may consume at the bar, the bagman moistens his repast with either malt or alcohol, succeeded by a glass of port which is poured out for him when the dessert is placed on the table.

It is at this moment that the chairman—at whose glance the waiters silently retire—rises to his feet and proposes the health of the British sovereign, which is drunk with all due ceremony and solemnity, and is followed by other toasts and, on occasion, by a speech or two. On Sundays the dinner is more elaborate, the wine—which is openly charged in the salesman's expense account as his right—of a better quality and the ceremonies a trifle more ornate than usual; and when we consider the fact that all this is gone through with every day in the year in almost every inn of any importance in Great Britain, we gain some idea of the difference between the drummer and the bagman and of the respect that every Englishman pays to his sovereign and his digestion.

Swinging Round the Circle With Roosevelt

By William Allen White

FOR half a century it has been usual—one might say fashionable—for American Presidents to "swing around the circle." Naturally, one would expect Americans to become proficient in the conduct of fêtes, with fifty years of experience. But the visit of a President to the average American community lacks something between ninety-four and ninety-seven per cent. of the pomp and splendor and magnificence of the scene on the field of the cloth of gold. Generally speaking, the community visited by a President is a small town, probably under fifty thousand. And usually the conquering hero comes something like this: An hour before train time the crowd begins to gather at the depot—a long, low, rakish-looking craft, red painted and sand coated, with wide eaves and a high platform at the east end on which men may sit swinging their feet. When the crowd gets packed too closely to get its handkerchiefs in comfort, the young man with calico sleeve-guards worms out of the depot, chalks up on the blackboard "Special fifteen minutes late," and retires amid a cataclysm of merry imprecation.

For a while the crowd rests one foot and then the other, and snaps its watches, and climbs on freight cars, and fills coal cars, and covers the depot roof, and looks wearily down the tracks at the horizon. There are twenty false alarms; and at the final "Here she comes!" no one is convinced till the little puff of white smoke rises and later the whistle sounds. As the smokestack emerges from the skyline and the sheen of the headlight flashes, the snare drum of the silver cornet band begins to br-r-r-r-rdum-dum, and as the face of the engineer comes out of the blur of distance the band begins to play Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean, with every man jack in the band looking at the train and every soul in the crowd yelling his lungs out. The train roars into the station and does not stop. On goes the train down the track and down the track, with the crowd flowing with marvelous rapidity through the hole the train has made. Finally the engine pulls up at the water-tank a hundred yards from the depot, and while the freight cars and coal cars and the depot roof are moulting their human feathers, a very ordinary-looking man comes out on the rear end of the train and begins talking to the thirty or forty fleet-footed citizens—generally boys—who have kept up with the car. Before the man has got two sentences out of his mouth the crowd has increased to two hundred, and by the time he has spoken a minute he is addressing cheering thousands who stand open-mouthed and breathless listening to his commonplace remarks with gravity, if not awe. If the President talks five minutes the multitude has grown so vast that only the high places of his voice reach the murmuring edge of the crowd, which begins to fringe itself with buggies and country wagons. A young man or two, notebook in hand, stands beside the President, and, by the time the crowd has found its consciousness enough to identify the other notables on the car platform, the engine bell begins to ring, and the President is cutting his remarks off as abruptly as he can and has begun to wave his hand. The train moves slowly, an old chap mounts the guard-rail to tell the President that he knew his father or that he fought with him in the tenth Ohio, or that he wants to shake his hand. There is a proud instant for the veteran, who tumbles awkwardly off the moving car among the small boys following the train; the straggling members of the band have huddled together and are playing America; the crowd is waving hats and hands and parasols; you can hear the buggies cramping and screeching at the rim of the mob; the details of the rear platform are beginning to disappear; the President may still be seen waving his hat at the crowd. The dignitaries who don't care for the crowd have gone in. The President's face has become a white dot on a black spot. The crowd turns away; the fête is over and the workaday world has begun for the little town.

This is repeated a dozen times a day, and for forty days and forty nights. It seems to have no effect on things. It seems a perfectly humdrum and meaningless occurrence, stupid and insignificant. Yet in this way policies are determined and events of real importance inspired. For there is no rhetorical force so potent in American politics as a President at the rear end of a train. From the birth of this generation of voters a President, talking to the people, whether he has talked crops or geography or political economy or the weather or ethics, or demonstrated a geometrical theorem, has brought them to his way of thinking on the tariff or the currency or our foreign policy, and this spring President Roosevelt has converted the nation to his way of thinking on the trust problem, though he has scarcely mentioned it in his speeches. He has given the question what might be called "absent treatment."

The Disappointed Mourners

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S Western tour this spring has not differed from the Western tours of other Presidents. There has probably been no more enthusiasm for him than there was for his predecessors, and no less. And yet, though he has not surprised his friends he has grievously disappointed his enemies. They expected this trip to be the rope with which he would hang himself. It is curious, when one doesn't like another, how often one predicts the disagreeable fellow's downfall, and it is astonishing how few predictions come true. The men who dislike Roosevelt naturally assume, because they don't like him, that he is a fool—a human error, by the way—and, assuming him to be a fool, they saw with complacence the opportunity for him to show it. For there is no place where folly crops out in a man as it does when he gets on his feet to say something when he has nothing in particular to say. After a man has made three or four speeches on any subject he is talked out. He can repeat himself or he may drivel. Roosevelt has chosen to say over again the thing he said before. Since the first week of his trip the newspapers have not printed his speeches, except the local papers, and no one has been particularly wiser for the President's repetition. His enemies have not witnessed his downfall; there have been no "untoward symptoms," and he has returned to Washington as much stronger than he was when he went out as any American President ever was, and as any American President ever may expect to be.

But for all this the Western trip of President Roosevelt had its distinguishing features. It differed from other tours of other Presidents "as one star differeth from another in glory." And the distinctive features of this trip are noteworthy. It has happened that practically every President who has toured the country since the Civil War has been an advocate of some theory of prosperity; has promulgated some doctrine that concerned the accumulation of national wealth. Cleveland stood for tariff reform. Harrison and McKinley were the exponents of protection. McKinley also stood for sound money as a means of national grace, and later he preached expansion as a sort of vicarious atonement by which the nation might retain its commercial salvation. But always the post-bellum Presidents have been concerned with the accumulation of riches for the people. Now the good times are here; the prosperity is unquestioned, and the problem that confronts President Roosevelt is one not of the accumulation but of the distribution of wealth. Strikes, trusts, labor unions, mergers and the like are manifestations of the problem of distribution. This problem is rather a new one to Americans—that is, as a practical problem, though, before there was much to distribute, the labor agitators and the socialists, and those academic gentlemen with a statistical turn of mind commonly called cranks, gave the problem a certain irritating speculative interest. But they were crossing the bridge before they got to it and their reflections have not been of much real use, now that the country is face to face with the real situation. And President Roosevelt, starting on his tour this spring, was the first President to set forth pioneering in a social and economic wilderness, with no guide nor compass but his conscience and his common-sense. Not comprehending a conscience and not appreciating his common-sense, it is no wonder that the President's enemies thought he would fall irretrievably.

The economic situation in the country is something like this: The thing called money is plentiful. Capital is seeking investment everywhere. Prices run high and profits are reasonably easy to make in any legitimate venture. Taking advantage of the prosperity, the men who have access to large sums of money have manipulated the stocks of industrial companies and, by throttling competition in some instances and arbitrarily advancing prices of commodities to consumers in other instances, have heaped up profits so lavishly that they have seemed more like unearned increment or bald robbery of the community than legitimate earnings of regular business operations. These combinations are called trusts. Their chiefest evil is that they demand interest of society on stock values that are dishonestly enlarged. The men who form trusts and batten on them are not industrial creators—as were the rich men of the last generation—but they form a class almost by themselves of shrewd, arrogant, greedy, conscienceless stock-brokers, who seem to have lost much of the wholesome earth-flavor of the "self-made men" who built the railroads, opened the mines, patented the machines, developed the industries and damned the people in the sixties, seventies and eighties. The millionaires of other days were human chaps, of the people and by the people, if not for the people. But the trust magnate is of a different sort. He is exclusive to a degree. He has his private agreement; he receives his private information from private sources about private matters. He rides in his private car over his private railroad, through his private States and Territories, and goes up into his private mountains or upon his private ocean, where he seems to worship his private god, who lets him do things barred from other men and pay the penance of a private contribution to a private charity for a public wrong. Naturally it would be possible for a President, or for any clever man who didn't care much for his country and did care a great deal for himself, to array the people against the trust manipulator, and thereby arouse class hatred and sow jealousy and envy and covetousness and the devil's own seed of sedition and riot. Doubtless the President's enemies expected him to do something of this sort. Because he had been just and because his justice hurt them, they believed him unfair and expected him to be unwise—which is the way of the world.

It was not because of his cunning that President Roosevelt fooled his enemies. He is not particularly shrewd in the foxy sense of the word. He is honest. It was because of his honesty that he disappointed those who looked with pleasure on his tour as the close of his career. There is a curious blindness in the eyes of that part of society which we call, for want of a better term, organized wealth. It cannot see the difference between the man who stands for simple justice, if he touches the purse of wealth, and the man who stands for plunder and threatens to take the whole purse and guillotine him who holds it. So when the President went forth preaching tolerance and temperance and brotherhood, and declaiming against class lines and advocating charity and patience and the fundamental virtues, these men who thought him a Danton were greatly impressed at his shrewdness—which is absurd.

The President's Cleansing Oratory

THESE speeches of the President are not models of diction; they may lack much of being rhetorically perfect. They are not particularly original in thought nor "deep" in philosophy. Yet, considering "the man, the subject and the occasion," these speeches are unique, and if they are not eloquent they are wonderfully material, astonishingly relevant and most competent, as the lawyers put it. Despite the fact that in his whole journey President Roosevelt has scarcely spoken of the trust problem and has offered no solution whatever for its evils, and has not connected his own personality nor his own ambition with any scheme or program to help things in the Government, his very self-effacement, his very lofty appeal for sheer decency, apart from any promise or above any hope of reward, has given him a place not merely in the hearts of the people but in their confidence which no combination of money and politicians can destroy. It will be worth while to look at some of his speeches a moment to see what the President has done.

Before he left Washington he had five or six speeches prepared, which were sent in advance to the members of the various press associations. It is a violation of no confidence to say that these were not epoch-making addresses, and after he left Dakota he got through with them and began talking rather than speechmaking. In this Roosevelt is strong, for he reveals all that is powerful and brave and fine in his own character. He is not an orator. Before an audience spoken language comes from him only after he has squirmed and twisted and screwed up his features. Then short, homely Saxon words and sudsy metaphors drip from him like water from a clothes-wringer. But his words have a cleansing and searching effect on his hearers. Roosevelt binds men to him by his unaffected sanity rather than by his surprising wisdom. He does not dazzle with logarithms, but convinces with the multiplication table. Here is a typical bit of Rooseveltism from his address at Dunsmuir, California:

> "I pity no man because he has to work. If he is worth his salt, he will work. I envy the man who has a work worth doing and does it well. It is the fact of doing the work well that counts, not the kind of work, as long as that work is honorable. To the true American nothing can be more alien than the spirit either of envy or of contempt for another who is leading a life as a decent citizen should lead it. In this country we have room for every honest man to spend his life in honest efforts; we have no room either for the man of means who in a spirit of arrogant baseness looks down upon the man less well off or for the man who envies his neighbor because that neighbor happens to be better off. Either feeling is a base feeling, unworthy of a self-respecting man. I used the word envy myself just now, but I did not use it in a bad sense. If you use envy in the ordinary sense of the word its existence implies a feeling of inferiority in the man who feels it, a feeling that a self-respecting man will be ashamed to have. If the man is a good American and is doing his work squarely, he need not envy anybody, because he occupies a position such as no one else in any other country, in any other age, has occupied; and because we hold our citizenship so high, because we feel and have the right to feel satisfaction with what our people have done, we should also feel that the only spirit in which to regard any other man who does well is a spirit of kindly regard and good will if he acts squarely; if he does not, then you regard him as a man to feel public scorn and public contempt. . . . From the days of Washington to the days of Lincoln we went onward and upward because the average American was of the stuff that made the nation go onward and upward. We cannot be dragged up; we have got to push ourselves up. All you have to do is to compare what other nations have done with governments founded as ours, the same type of constitution, the same type of laws, which, nevertheless, have failed, have produced chaos because they did not have the right type of citizen back of the law, the right type of citizen to work out the destiny of the nation under and through the law.
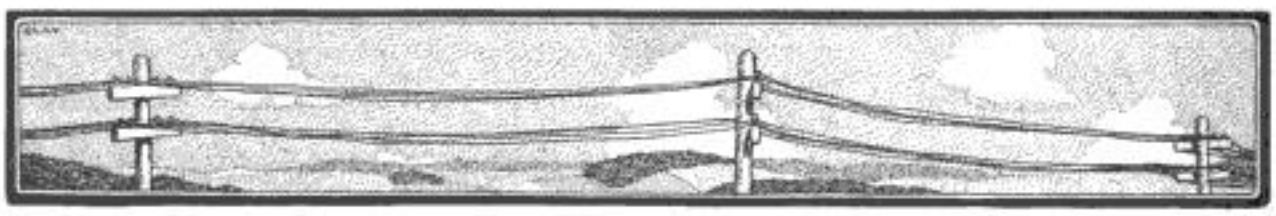
> "Of course we need the law; we need even more, the honest and fearless enforcement of the law, enforcement in a spirit of absolute fair play to all men, showing favoritism to none, doing justice to each. We need such laws, such administration of laws, but most of all we need to keep up that for the lack of which nothing else can atone in any people: the average standard of citizenship. In our life what we need is not so much genius, not so much brilliancy, as the ordinary, commonplace, every-day qualities which a man needs in private life, and which he needs just as much in public life."

Again at Portland he said:

> "Once more, not only must there be no line of demarcation among our people on grounds of creed or grounds of sect, but there must be no line of demarcation drawn among them on grounds of class or occupation. There is but one safe rule to follow in public life as in private life, and that is the old, old rule of treating your neighbor as you would like your neighbor to treat you; the old rule of decency, of honesty, of square dealing as between man and man. Just so long as our people keep character, so long as they have the fundamental virtues of decency, of courage, of common-sense, just so long may we rest assured that this country will go onward and upward until it occupies a place among the nations of mankind such as has never before been known since the days when history was first written."

From one end of the country to the other President Roosevelt went preaching the doctrine of individual self-respect and self-restraint and self-help. He used no claptrap. He did not talk about our glorious country, nor ask people to rally around the flag or vote the straight ticket, nor did he hint at the benefits of protection, nor did he insist on the wisdom of maintaining the parity between gold and silver. The patter of the political orator was absent, and the strong note of appeal to all citizens to be unselfish and fair and charitable was found in every utterance. The President might well be called a revivalist, turning men from the avarice and wanton thoughtlessness and meannesses of this day and generation to those things which put men and nations in harmony with "reason and the will of God."

The Consecration Before the Battle



AND thus, despite himself, he has made real and sound public sentiment, to handle the problems of distribution which confront the country in the so-called labor question and the trust question. Problems of prosperity, of accumulation of wealth, must of necessity be handled by sentiment that is fundamentally selfish. Acquisition is selfishness, and men who vote for prosperity do so from self-interest—and properly so. But to handle a problem concerned with the distribution of wealth, men must approach their work in the spirit of abnegation. If greed and selfishness inspire men who are about to grapple with a problem which first of all concerns the rights of others, the result will be a riot call followed by a general looting. And if the country is to solve intelligently and equitably the problems that now confront it, the people of this country must use all the virtues of generosity, of mutual giving and taking, of Christian charity that the American character can call into action. Whether the President knew this, or whether his preaching was one of those unconscious manifestations that truly representative men always disclose, it would be idle to discuss. But this fact no one may question: That just before the battle there has been a moment of consecration, and that, though the fight will be none the less bitter, it will be fair and manly and brave to the end.

It is because of his earnestness and his apparent unselfishness and his lofty purpose that the people, irrespective of party and place, cleave to Roosevelt. It is just because he dares to preach—as he did before the International Young Men's Christian Convention of railroad men at Topeka, Kansas—and to preach Christian love and Christian work, that there are more people who have the feeling of affection, more people who are saying "God bless the President" to-day than have been saying it for a living President since Lincoln's time. The President and what may be called the masses—and by that one doesn't mean the rabble—are in perfect accord. And it is not because he is President, and as President is canny, that the people take Roosevelt to their hearts; there is nothing of either sycophancy or awe for his smartness in the feeling that the people have for him. They like him because he is a man and not ashamed to show it by his words and deeds, by his affections and his aversions; they like him because he is frank and often brusque, because he reveals an appreciable human character which is good and strong. Public men of recent years have kept behind their masks too much, have displayed too much public character and not enough private character; have been the public man—buttoned up, encrusted, statesmanlike, talking like a legal document and acting as circumspectly as a manikin. Such public men inspire admiration; indeed they arouse a kind of worship. But they don't inspire fighting affection.

President Roosevelt is not only a popular man, the ideal American, but he is ex-officio the head of the Government, and can turn the energy of his popularity into a force for good in the Government. There is no more doubt that he will do this, if he can, than that he will breathe when he needs air. The trip through the West was not entirely for the President's health. He went to the people to establish personal relations with the people; not because he was lonely in the White House, but because, in the contest that is coming, he desired the power of the people's trust and faith. The struggle that is coming is going to repeat a world-old struggle, in which there is but one outcome possible with human nature constituted as it is. A glance at the situation will reveal the exact status of things.

The People Against the Barons

HERE is a class of persons controlling vast combinations of capital, ruling the industrial affairs of the country; the people verily believe that these capitalists, who form a kind of aristocracy, are extorting more money from the people in increased prices for commodities than the law of supply and demand, unhampered by manipulation, would justify. By resolutions of commercial clubs and by political platforms innumerable and by newspaper editorials the people are protesting against the injustices of this money aristocracy—let us call it the barons. The people have appealed to the head of the Government—to the ruler of the country, so far as it has one. It is the old fight of the people and the ruler against the barons. And when the ruler has been a clean man, reasonable, wise, fighting in a just cause, he and the people have invariably whipped the barons, and they will do it this time. If the gentlemen who represent the greed and arrogance of high finance and not its sane intelligence dominate its action, and control its course and force a fight, they have the history of such fights through all civilization to warn them of the end. It is written that they cannot win. Money will avail them nothing. Political organization will not give them strength. And the farther they force the fight the farther they will have to walk back and the more they will have to surrender. They can get more in a compromise now than at any other time in the contest. Fair dealing with the President and with the people in matters political will bring more returns to the combinations of capital in violation of law called the trusts, will yield larger and more continued returns, than any other possible investment. All these things the people and the President settled while they were talking together this spring. There is an exact understanding between them. There was no collusion in the matter. No consideration was named by either side. The people did not in terms agree to make Theodore Roosevelt President in return for his loyalty to them. Nothing was said on that question on either side. And yet there is no doubt that in their many conferences on the plain and in the mountain, by the ocean and in gulch and cañon, as they traveled together, the people and their President reached something that might be called "a gentlemen's agreement!"

THE COUNTESS DECIDES

By ROBERT BARR

Copyright, 1907, by The Curtis Publishing Company. Copyright in Great Britain

THE arrival of the Countess caused a subdued flutter in the society which frequented the edge of the desert. The Ptolemy Park Hotel, as every one knows, occupies a depression in the sand, a short distance from the Great Pyramid. It is rather a fashionable resort, and you may live somewhat better at the Park than on the sand-which-is there, as the ancient humorist remarked. It became known that the Countess of Croydon had taken a suite of rooms at the hotel, and the inhabitants thereof wondered whether they would be permitted a sight of this great lady, for she was said to be extremely eccentric, fairly young, admittedly beautiful and undoubtedly rich. Although she owned a desirable town house she had never occupied it, and London society knew nothing of her personality. At last this mysterious young lady was about to issue from her seclusion and brave the publicity of a popular hotel. Naturally, the guests of the Ptolemy Park were anxious to see a person so much talked of, and bets stood at ten to one that she would not come. The knowing ones, predicting disappointment, said that on several previous occasions the Countess had been announced to appear at certain social functions in London, but invariably had failed at the last moment. Her apartment had unquestionably been taken and rooms were at a premium, because the season had just begun with more than ordinary promise. Cairo was buzzing with excitement over the opening of the great dam at Assouan, and was crowded with distinguished visitors on their way to the ceremony. If Cairo could be likened to a social dam, the Ptolemy Park Hotel might be said to receive the irrigating result of the overflow, and those who had not secured accommodation in advance now applied in vain at the cashier's desk.

The arrival of the Countess was much less imposing than had been generally expected, but then Lord Warlingham himself had come by tram car a few days before, so it was universally agreed that members of the nobility could not always be counted upon to indulge in the display popularly supposed to pertain to their rank. The Countess drove up to the main entrance in an ordinary hotel carriage hired for the trip at Cairo. Her sole attendant was one exceedingly plain maid who inquired tartly of the gold-laced individual who came to open the carriage door if the rooms of the Countess of Croydon were ready, and was obsequiously assured that they were. Gold lace led the way and the Countess, looking neither to the right nor the left, followed. The guests had an excellent view of her, and even the women admitted that she was more than handsome, carrying herself with an air of distinction. They agreed, however, that she was not so young as she appeared to be, and hinted that the plain maid must understand the art of making up in a manner that would do credit to an actress. The next problem was: Would she appear at dinner or would the meals be served in her own sitting-room? The puzzle was solved long before dinner was announced. Every afternoon the denizens of the hotel gathered in the ample hall, in the reading-room, and elsewhere for tea; in fact, for all the difference of living each one might have been at the Metropole in Brighton, rather than at the base of the pyramids. Tea was a joyous festival, with much laughter, gossip and cigarettes in the hall. If you objected to tobacco you enjoyed your cup in the drawing-room.

THE COUNTESS CAME DOWN THE BROAD STAIRWAY WITH SOME SLIGHT DEGREE OF HESITATION

The Countess came down the broad stairway with some slight degree of hesitation, as if she feared the multitude of inquiring eyes about to be turned upon her. A tall gentleman who happened to be passing looked up at her, then paused and actually appeared to be waiting for her. He spoke with a half-laughing diffidence that almost amounted to a stutter, as he fumbled with his eye-glasses.

"Although I have never had the pleasure of meeting you I believe we are by way of being related to each other. My name is Warlingham."

The lady stopped on the lower step and a look of startled annoyance came for a moment into her eyes. There was a note of indifference, but nevertheless of inquiry, in her voice when at last she said: "Lord Warlingham?"

"Yes. I think I was not mistaken when I ventured to suggest that our families are connected."

"Very remotely, I fear."

"I am told that the kinship of cousin extends to the forty-second degree," replied his lordship with that depreciatory audible smile of his which gave him the air of a bashful boy, although he must have been well past his fortieth year.

The lady laughed nervously. "I think that when the kinship reaches the forties the adjective remote becomes justified," she said.

"Possibly. Still, as like clings to like, remoteness has affinity for remoteness, and we are so remote from England that I venture to claim our distant relationship as warrant for my escorting you to a tea-table."

The lady descended the remaining step. Her awkwardness at the unexpected encounter vanished, and they walked together down the hall, at that moment thronged with tea drinkers. Every one of the small tables was occupied, but Lord Warlingham guided his fair cousin toward a couple of wicker chairs that were empty, although a lone man sat at the table beside them. Lord Warlingham seemed the most popular person in the assembly; women smiled at him as he passed, and men nodded in cheerful comradeship.

In a low voice his lordship said to his companion, quite with the confidential manner of an old acquaintance:

"Do you care to be introduced to people, or would you rather not?"

"Oh, I don't mind in the least if they are nice people."

"Is the recluse to become the woman of fashion?"

"For the time being, at least," replied the Countess with a slight laugh.

The lone man, when the two approached, rose hastily as if to leave the table to them, but the genial Warlingham begged him to resume his place. Turning to his cousin he said:

"May I introduce to you Mr. Sanderstead, C. E., F. R. G. S. and so forth, with more letters after his name than there are in it. Lady Croydon."

Sanderstead murmured something as he bowed, his dark face flushing as if he resented the flippancy of the introducer. The lady, noticing his gaunt appearance and tanned cheeks, thought that he was likely one of those newly returned from the finished war, but as they all sat down at the wicker table Warlingham rattled on and explained:

"Sanderstead and I represent the two opposite poles of human existence. He has just completed the great Nile dam and is down here to learn what the ancient and honorable pyramids have to say about it. I represent the useless but ornamental pyramid, while he represents the useful but unbeautiful dam. He is the ant, I am the grasshopper. He is the bee and I am——"

"The honeysuckle," broke in the engineer.

"Thanks. I was going to say the butterfly, but I accept the amendment as adding a modern and musical touch."

The Countess seemed to understand intuitively that Sanderstead did not quite relish his lordship's frivolous badinage, so she turned the direction of the conversation, saying to the latter:

"I supposed from an item in the newspaper that you were in Cairo this season."

"Yes, but I left there to get out of the rush that has taken place because of the ceremonies at Assouan. Still, this spot is actually Cairo. The pyramids occupy the relative position with regard to the chief city of Egypt that the Crystal Palace holds with respect to London."

"Really? I hope you haven't fireworks every Thursday night."

"Dear lady, we have fireworks every day from a blazing sun."

"And have you come here to avoid the rush?" she asked of Sanderstead.

"Practically; yes. But not the social rush dreaded by Warlingham. The rush of Nile water has been in my ears this long time past, and I am resting in the eternal silence of the pyramids."

"How romantic!" exclaimed the Countess.

"Indeed, madam, it is nothing of the sort," put forth his lordship. "Sanderstead is troubled with the affliction that haunts the criminal. He flees from the scene of his crime. He has throttled Father Nile and has extinguished the roar that for centuries broke the stillness of the desert. He found a joyous, ambulating, laughing cataract—life embodied in a dancing torrent; he has left in its place a graveyard of motionless waters. Not to put too fine a point upon it, Sanderstead is a murderer."

The engineer smiled grimly, but made no comment on the other's rhapsody.

"Aren't you going up for the opening ceremony?" asked the girl, turning to Sanderstead.

"No. The work is done and that leaves me free for a short time. Now is the opportunity for the ornamental personages, as our friend called them, to take a hand and make speeches. I have been urging Warlingham to go and almost persuaded him, for he cannot work; so he should not be ashamed to do the ornamental."

"Ah, persuasion was possible yesterday; it is out of the question to-day," said Warlingham in a low voice, with a speaking glance at his handsome companion. She, however, asked with candor apparently innocent:

"Why not to-day? Isn't there plenty of time?"

"It is not a question of time," sighed his lordship.

"If it is a question of money, Warlingham, I can help you out. I was paid off, you know," said the engineer.

This was an unkind remark, because his lordship was well known to be in constant lack of the necessity named, so Warlingham flushed slightly and replied with some asperity:

"Thanks, dear boy, but why should I wish to see that curse of so-called modern progress you have placed on a noble river?"

"I didn't curse it; I merely dammed it," replied Sanderstead.

The Countess rose.

"The pyramids have been waiting a long time for me," she said. "I am going out to view them in the afternoon light."

"It will be a case of age before beauty," said his lordship, also rising; "may I accompany the beauty to the age?"

Sanderstead, also standing, took his share of the smile with which the lady favored both, but apparently remembering the adage about three being too many so far as company is concerned, he sat down again when they had taken their departure, muttering to himself:

"A case of beauty and the beast, I should say," which showed he was already envious of the good fortune of the nobleman.

Lord Warlingham made the most of his opportunity. When we reach forty we know what we want and lose no time in schoolboy dalliance. He was charmingly urbane, qualified by a slight tinge of sentimentality, and was wide enough awake to see that he made a favorable impression. He regretted that he had not looked up this delightful if very distant relative long since, and he resolved to visit Cairo next day and learn something definite regarding her income even if he had to cable for the information to his legal advisers in London. They would know the importance of the facts and the need of their client. Meanwhile, with the deftness of much experience he laid the foundation upon which might be builded either a frivolous flirtation or a serious courtship. It was quite evident that the girl knew as little of fashionable life as if she had just emerged from a convent, and this gave him hope that she had heard nothing of his adventures in quest of an heiress, if she happened to be of a romantic turn of mind, which his slight acquaintance with her caused him to think highly probable.

He regretted that in a heedless moment he had introduced her to Sanderstead, for if his own stay in Cairo was prolonged, or if he went there day after day until his message came from London, he left the field open. If the lady were merely the daughter of a rich nobody he might rely on the glamor of his title to keep her safe during his absences, but the girl had a title in her own right, so one of his chief assets was discounted. He had seen the young lady's eyes sparkle when the great work up the river was mentioned and he noticed the look of interest with which she had regarded this newspaper-famed miracle-worker. It was quite possible that she had some silly notions about men who could do things. Many women had. Besides, he could not conceal from himself the fact that the worn engineer had a certain gaunt, bronzed handsomeness which the women of the hotel admired, and besides, he was ten years younger than Warlingham, although, perhaps, that might not count.

As the days passed the Countess became the acknowledged leader of society at the Ptolemy Park, and the young lady quite palpably enjoyed her reign hugely, which she had every right to do, because her Paris gowns were numerous and resplendent. It was unaccountable that one so well qualified to shine in polite society should have been a recluse for so long, and predictions were freely made that she would never return to her hermit life.

The man who had helped to conquer the Nile allowed no grass to grow under his feet in his attempt to conquer the lady, even if grass grew in the desert, which it did not. The frequent absences of Lord Warlingham, who quite correctly stated that annoying matters of business called him to Cairo, and even to Alexandria, gave Richard Sanderstead opportunities of which he was quick to take advantage. These opportunities vanished when the submarine cable at last fulfilled its destiny. The news was well worth the money it cost, for the lady's income proved to be between £14,000 and £15,000 a year. Even a man with the expensive tastes of Warlingham could do with that, as he remarked to himself. Nevertheless, two words at the end of the cablegram disquieted him. They were, "Wait letter." He wondered what the letter could contain that it needed this courier of caution. Perhaps there was insanity in the Croydon family which might account for the lady's avoidance of publicity. Still she showed no sign of it, and anyhow that would not matter if the money were right. Hard cash has no delusions, whatever may be the mental attributes of its owner. Perhaps, however, the money might be tied up in some annoying manner, which would be a more serious but probably not an insurmountable difficulty. He would chance it and wait no letter. That confounded engineer was making the running and his advances were far from being discouraged by their object. Hang it all, when the letter arrived it might be too late, whereas when he secured her he could always find a way of retreat if the contents of the letter made retreat necessary. The nobility often sued for divorce but never for breach of promise. The latter was a form of litigation monopolized by the lower classes, so he was safe in any case.

The moon was growing older and the nights were becoming like chastened silvery day. The Countess declared that she never before knew what moonlight really was, and Lord Warlingham urged her to view the pyramids as Melrose

"I DIDN'T CURSE IT; I MERELY DAMMED IT" should be viewed. As the night was chilly he advised wraps, and his attitude was one of fond protection which is not without its influence upon the feminine heart. The moon shone upon the right-hand cheek of the Sphinx, bestowing additional mystery upon that inscrutable face. It lit the eastern side of the Great Pyramid and thither the two bent their steps. Their conference was disturbed now and then by unexpected Arabs who seemed to rise out of the sand to demand contributions, but one glance at his lordship's countenance sent them to earth again. They knew him these many days and had made no money out of him, so even their insistent clamor was stilled when they recognized the Englishman whose imperturbability had always baffled them. Their unlooked-for advent somewhat startled the lady, but Warlingham made some jocular allusion to those classical Johnnies, don't you know, who sprang full armed from the earth like, "I forget the beggars' names," he added, "but you know the chaps I mean," and so the pair came unmolested to the eastern base of the Great Pyramid, and he helped her over broken stone up a step or two, where they sat together facing the distant Nile and the still more distant moon. He sat very near to her, and tried to capture her hand, but at that moment came the necessity of gathering her wraps more closely about her and he gave up the quest for the moment. Even so blasé a man as Lord Warlingham never had a better setting for a proposal than was his fortune in this case. The glamor of the moon filled the lustrous eyes of the lady beside him. Behind them rose this great monument of Egypt's power; Egypt, whose queen was a very goddess of love; Egypt, at one time the treasury of the world, and before his lordship's mind, even at that moment, floated the golden glow of fifteen thousand sovereigns per annum. In front of them stretched the languorous East. Every requirement of situation was satisfied, and, after all, she was deucedly pretty, as his lordship admitted when he glanced sideways at her as she sat near him on the elevated fifth step of the Great Pyramid. The influence of past ages was upon her. She gazed to the east as the Sphinx gazed to the north, and as silently. Hitherto she had spoken almost pertly, one might say, were not such a saying inexcusable when she held the rank she did. A real countess cannot speak pertly; a king can do no wrong. Lord Warlingham drew a deep breath as he recognized the perfection of his stage management: a deep breath which he modified into a tender sigh. He wished he knew the girl's Christian name so that he might begin tenderly, but as he was ignorant on that point he was compelled to use her title, which he recognized was bad form, as if a friend had addressed him as "your lordship."

"Countess," he began solemnly, "on our first meeting you held that our relationship was a very distant one."

She almost gasped and the enchantment of the Orient faded from her face as she turned it upon him. A humorous twinkle came into her eyes and somewhat chilled the sentimentality so well modulated in his deep, tremulous voice.

"Well, if we are relatives we are certainly very close ones at this moment." Whereat she shifted a little farther along the fifth step toward the south. "To tell the truth, I had forgotten you were here." She laughed lightly.

This might have discouraged a less adept lover, but it merely proclaimed to Lord Warlingham that he must put his best foot forward. It also banished from his mind those two words on the cablegram in his pocket, "Wait letter," which had been rather haunting him during the evening.

"Countess, I was never more serious in my life. We have known each other but a short time, yet this brief period has been to me a—a——"

"An interval of bliss hitherto undreamed in my—in my intercourse with your siren sex. Is that what you wish to say? My dear Cousin Warlingham, is this—is this a proposal that is on the way?"

The lady clasped her hands and leaned toward him, the witchery of mischief in her dancing eyes. Lord Warlingham was aghast. He had never met anything like this before. Yet to his credit be it said that he held himself well in hand and did not take quite justifiable offense at the flippant reception of what he knew was a great honor on his part.

"Cousin," he said with a solemnity equal to that of the pyramid behind him, "you are pleased to laugh at me. To me, however, it is the most fateful moment of my existence. I freely admit that I have led a somewhat aimless life. This has doubtless been my own fault. Yet not entirely. If a man has a guiding star, his course through——"

"Oh, I read somewhere that one corner of this pyramid points to the North Star. Do you know if that is true?"

"I must confess I have not the slightest idea."

"Let us find out. It must be one of the southern corners, of course."

She was about to spring from the fifth step but he laid a restraining hand upon hers, which in this instance had not the opportunity to seek refuge in adjusting the wraps.

"Never mind the North Star," he said.

"But it is a fixed star; just the one to be a reliable guide for an erratic man. Are you sure it isn't the star you are longing for?"

"I am quite sure. The star I am longing for shines from your eyes. As I said in the beginning, you spoke of our distant relationship. I wish to make our relationship the closest bond that can bind two human beings together."

"You speak a great deal about our mythical relationship, Lord Warlingham. I have lived all my life in Devonshire; you have lived much of your life in London. Well, the Great Western Railway has a speedy and excellent service. Why did you never look up your lone cousin before?"

"How could I know?"

"How could you know what? Did you think we had nothing to eat in the house? Or do you mean that I am so transcendently beautiful and charming—you ought to know that people say I am decidedly eccentric. Some give it a harsher term. What is it you could not know?"

"I could not know that you were the one of all this world for me until I had met you."

"I see." The lady nodded several times while he gazed at her with ill-concealed apprehension. "This, then, is a proposal, as I suspected. Well, I have never before had a proposal, and naturally I am somewhat at a loss how to act. I am, nevertheless, delighted to think that the first time I have appeared, as it were, in public I have been honored by so distinguished a person as Lord Warlingham."

"I ask you to be my wife. What is your answer?" His lordship was piqued by her nonchalant reception of what she had described as an honor, and not being a schoolboy, as has been remarked, he thought it best to bring the question to a definite issue.

"Should a person answer immediately? It is so important, you know. In penny novelettes they always ask for time. Do you ever read penny novelettes?"

"No," he replied gruffly.

"They are very interesting."

"I suppose they are." For the first time during this unsatisfactory conversation the fear penetrated through his lordship's armor of self-conceit that this accursed dam builder had won the fortune while he was waiting for information regarding its extent. He leaned over toward her and said in a low voice:

"Am I too late?"

"I don't think so," she replied brightly, glancing up at the moon which had risen perceptibly since they had taken their seats. "It cannot be more than half-past ten or perhaps eleven. But don't you think it is getting more and more chilly?"

"Yes," said his lordship with a sigh that was genuine. "It has been chilly from the first."

The Countess laughed merrily.

"Does that refer to me or to the thermometer? You are rather bright—at times. You remind me of the moon—the glorious moon. There is a compliment for you. Do you remember that song in Pinafore—

> Fair Moon, to thee I sing,
> Bright regent of the heavens?"

"Yes, I remember it," he replied gloomily, "and in the words of the last two lines of your verse, I wonder why everything is at sixes and at sevens."

"How long ago Pinafore seems," she said with a sigh, folding her hands on her lap. "I suppose it is the pyramids that call it to mind."

"Madam, you have not answered my question."

"Neither I have. I shall make up for the delay by giving you choice of two answers. The first is 'no'; the second is 'wait.'"

"Why should I wait?"

"No reason at all. Then 'no' is your answer."

"That is a very good reason, so I shall wait."

"Just as you please. Let us get to the hotel, or even my chaperonage will not protect you from gossiping tongues. Come."

Before he could move to her assistance she had run lightly over the rocky declivity and was standing on the sand awaiting his more cautious descent. Then they walked back to the hotel together.

The result of this conference was exceedingly unsatisfactory to Lord Warlingham, and the more he thought of it the less he liked it. On several following nights he tried to induce the Countess to accompany him again to their former trysting place, but the lady seemed to have lost interest in the moonlight. One evening she had dinner served in her own room, and although he waited for her in the hall she did not put in an appearance. He went to table d'hôte alone and afterward searched in vain for the lady. He thought, at first, that she had not come down, but as he wandered about the place he noticed that Sanderstead also was missing, and he muttered maledictions under his breath. At this moment a waiter approached and handed him a letter, which he tore open and read with some eagerness; then he stared out of the window upon the moonlight road.

"Well, I'm blessed!" he said.

His impatience fell away from him like a discarded cloak and he sat down in one of the armchairs, lighting a cigar.

"Just in the nick of time," he muttered with a sigh of great relief.

The Countess, after an early dinner, slipped down the stair, through the hall and out of the hotel. All the guests were at table d'hôte and she hoped thus to depart unseen. But on this occasion she had to do with a man of mathematical mind who left nothing to chance, as did the easy-going Warlingham. As the waiter placed a plate of chicken before Richard Sanderstead he whispered unheard by even the next neighbor. "Just gone out, sir." Sanderstead rose at once and very quietly left the chattering table. Half a dinner is better than no meal.

The Countess walked straight south across the desert, looking neither to the right nor the left, deep in thought with head down. It was a rough road, yet she walked fast. Once or twice she half thought she heard other footsteps than her own, and at last a distinct crunch on the gravel brought her suddenly out of her reverie. She turned quickly and stood still, startled. The moonlight fell full on the spare figure and swart, determined face of the man at that moment in her mind.

"Why are you following me?"

"Because your excursion, unwise in daylight, is doubly dangerous at night," replied Sanderstead.

"Who made you my guardian?"

"I am self-appointed."

"I ask you to return."

"Willingly, if you come with me."

"I refuse."

"Then so do I."

"Do you mean to say that you will force your company on me when I forbid it?"

"I shall not force my company on you, but I'll follow you to Khartum if you go that far."

"A gentleman would not do so."

"Some would and some wouldn't. All depends."

"I wish to be alone with my thoughts."

"I shall not disturb them. I didn't begin this conversation."

"Oh, very well," she replied with offended dignity, turning from him and walking rapidly to the south again, as if she hoped to outdistance him, but he kept the space undiminished between them with no show of effort. They had gone thus perhaps a mile when Sanderstead sprang forward and past her. Before she could protest she was somewhat taken aback by seeing a horseman emerge at a gallop from behind a sand dune and draw up before them, the beautiful horse, at a word, bracing its slender forelegs and standing like a bronze statue. The Arab had his rifle ready, but catching the gleam of Sanderstead's revolver he placed his own weapon peacefully athwart the saddle. Sanderstead spoke quietly in Arabic, and the horseman answered with something more of deference in his tone than his attitude had at first betokened. Sanderstead strode forward and patted the lovely arched neck of the horse, complimenting its owner on its possession. With a touch of the heel and a sweeping salutation the Arab disappeared as speedily as he had come.

"What did he say?" she asked breathlessly.

"Oh, he just asked the way to Piccadilly Circus."

The Countess drew herself up, and as the moonlight now flooded her he saw the deep frown that marred her fair face.

"Sir, you are insulting. If you think because we are alone you can treat me like a child you are mistaken."

"Alone!" he laughed, then checked himself. "By Jove, you do look like a countess, after all!" he cried with unfeigned admiration, as he gazed upon the girl. Her defiant manner changed instantly.

"What do you mean by that?" she gasped.

"It was merely an expression of my esteem for you. I think it is time to turn, you know. We will leave Khartum for another night."

"You expected me to lose myself, but you forget we are in a land that has pyramids for finger-posts."

"Where are they?"

She swept a glance around the northern horizon. Although the moon shone with undiminished brightness, the air in the distance seemed thickened, or else she had traveled farther than she thought. There were no pyramids in sight.

"I'll soon lead you to them," cried the Countess undaunted.

And she did. When their dim outline appeared she pointed in triumph, crying, "There!"

"You followed your shadow," he said; "an excellent guide until the moon gets low. I've been following a shadow, too, which I wish to change into substance. Countess, I love you. Will you marry me?"

"How abrupt you are, and what a stand-and-deliver tone! Is that because you carry a pistol?"

"I am not nearly so abrupt as you imagine. I have been meditating this appeal for a long time, and as the pyramids begin to appear my opportunity begins to vanish."

"You know nothing of me."

"I know enough."

"That does not sound in the least complimentary. I will give you an answer as abrupt as your question. Yes, I will marry you—if you are rich."

"WELL, IF WE ARE RELATIVES WE ARE CERTAINLY VERY CLOSE ONES AT THIS MOMENT"

"If I am rich? Are you so fond of money as all that?"

"Ah, I said you knew nothing of me."

"Let us sit down here and discuss the question."

In the desert are numerous hollows, some deep and some shallow. On the edge of one of these they sat down in the sand, like a pair of children at the seaside.

"Rich!" he reiterated. "What do you call rich?"

"I don't know," she answered dreamily, her chin resting on her hand.

"Are you rich?" he asked.

"Don't you know I am?"

"I have heard it so stated."

"Then why did you ask?"

"I wished to learn your idea of riches. How much have you got?"

"I don't know," she repeated in the same nonchalant tone.

"You have some idea. Make a guess."

"One hundred thousand pounds," she hazarded.

"Oh, is that all. I have a hundred and twenty thousand."

"Have you really?"

"That is to say, for the past five years or so I have earned an average of £3000 per annum. That equals the income of £120,000 or thereabouts in consols."

"Oh, that's not quite the same thing. If a bridge you were building collapsed upon you there was an end of your hundred and twenty thousand."

"The bridges I build don't collapse."

"I am so glad."

"But banks containing money do. I think we're about equal on the money question."

"I don't really care about riches, yet they have been the bugbear of my life. I distrust every one. I refuse to be married for my money, therefore I demand equality of wealth. I thought this little dip into society, such as it is, might dissolve my difficulties. It has not done so."

"Why don't you give your money away?"

"I know something of the comfort of wealth, and I don't know the value of what I might get in exchange. It would be a case of flying to others that I know not of."

"Look at me and see if you think it would be worth while."

"How conceited you are! I have been doing nothing else but look at you."

"And the distrust continues?"

"Not while I look. If I gave my money away, what could I do until the undoubted man came along?"

"You would make an admirable actress."

The chin raised from her hand, and the dreamy expression gave place to one of alert alarm.

"Why do you say that?"

"Because you are so beautiful the whole theatre would fall in love with you."

"I don't believe that is what you mean."

"I assure you it is. Don't let money stand between us. Tie it up in a hard knot so that I can't touch it, and marry me."

"Excellent plan! As if the man I married could not get every penny he wanted from me. However, I'll think over it and let you know. Come; we must be journeying."

"Better take the plunge now, Countess."

"No. I distrust—myself. Here we are building on a foundation of sand; surely an engineer knows how unstable that is; and we are constructing a house of moonbeams, also unsubstantial. I must think in the clear light of day and in a modern room furnished by Maple. Come along."

In the hall of the hotel she met Lord Warlingham pacing up and down. She had asked Sanderstead to allow her to enter the hotel alone, which, somehow, the young man regarded as an encouraging omen. Warlingham stopped in his perambulations and faced her. The usual welcoming smile on his lips was absent.

"Madam," he said, "I wish a few words with you in private."

"Not to-night," she almost whispered, shrinking from him.

"It must be to-night and now," he said harshly. "If you imagine that it is to be a repetition of my proposal you may calm your fears. It is a matter of business."

"Very well. Come to my sitting-room."

They went upstairs together, her waiting-maid following her with the wraps, and glancing sourly at her escort.

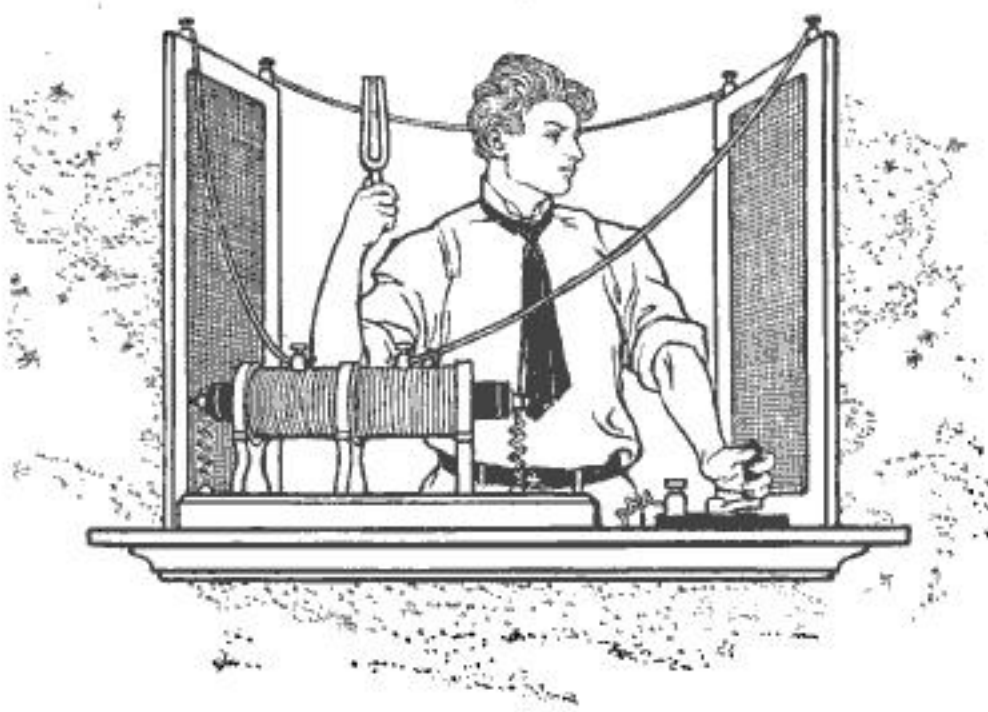
"I wish to speak with you alone. Please ask your maid to leave the room."

"You may speak quite freely before Parker. Won't you sit down?"

But his lordship remained standing. The Countess sank into an armchair with a sigh of weariness.

"It shall be as you please, but I advise you to hear me alone. Servants gossip."

"Parker never does," said the girl, with her eyes closed.



And, indeed, Parker looked forbidding enough as she stood behind the chair of her mistress, seeming the last one on earth to indulge in confidences.

"I have received a letter from London and with your permission will read an extract:

> It is well known that the Countess intended to winter in Egypt, but we are credibly informed that she changed her mind at the last moment, as she has so often done before, and we believe she is still at her place in Devonshire. If there is any one in Cairo calling herself the Countess of Croydon her claim to that title should be subjected to critical scrutiny.

MOSQUITO MUSIC

A New Method of Extermination Which Takes Him Singing to His Death

By HAROLD BOLCE

IN MAKING experiments for the purpose of developing new and effective methods of fighting mosquitoes, practical application has been made of the remarkable discovery that a certain musical note raised to a great number of vibrations per second will cause these insects to experience sudden and complete paralysis. Not only does this intensified note arrest the mosquito in flight or hurl it from ceiling or wall, but also, because of a strange construction of the insect's auditory system, it causes the mosquito to plunge undeviatingly toward the spot whence the music issues.

Hence, by sounding this note and arranging a paper screen or any receptacle in the immediate vicinity of the musical instrument, all the mosquitoes in a room or house, and, in fact, all of these insects within the radius of the undiminished sound-wave, may be caught and destroyed. A scientific electrician has invented a screen charged with sufficient voltage to electrocute the insects as they are thus precipitated.

In the series of investigations leading up to this phenomenal discovery of the potency of certain sound-waves, scientists have learned that in ability to detect the direction whence sound issues the mosquito is unequaled in the entire animal kingdom, the insect's auditory acuteness in this regard surpassing by far that of the human ear.

From each of the twelve joints of a mosquito's antennæ radiates a whorl of fibrils whose length is three hundred times their diameters. These fibrils, which are remarkably elastic, are attuned to catch sounds ranging from middle C to high C. These facts have been disclosed by experiments which also develop the phenomenon that the sensitive auditory system of mosquitoes serves the purpose of enabling them to locate their mates in the darkness of night.

By cementing live mosquitoes with shellac to a plate of glass held horizontally, it was possible to test the effect of certain sounds upon the external portion of the insects' auditory system. By sounding a Ut_3 tuning-fork producing two hundred and fifty-six vibrations a second an amazing response was produced in certain fibrils of the mosquitoes. Higher and lower harmonics of this note also affected the auditory fibrils, but intermediate notes made little impression. In other words, a Ut_2 tuning-fork, producing one hundred and twenty-eight vibrations a second (one-half as many as are caused by the first fork), would exert a far greater influence upon the fibrils than a Mi_4 fork, producing six hundred and forty vibrations a second, which sum is not a multiple or harmonic of the other two. In some instances fibrils were found to be so delicately attuned to notes produced by the Ut_3 fork that they vibrated through eighteen divisions of the micrometer, whereas sounds which were not harmonics of that note, although giving forth more than double the number of vibrations to the second, scarcely made a visible impression.

The Mosquito's Delicate Attunement

THE practical application of these ingenious experiments has been effected by raising to a far greater number of vibrations the second the particular note to which the mosquito is most sensitively attuned. This intensified note was produced by sudden electrical impulse upon a musical instrument, whereupon the astonishing discovery was made that every mosquito in the room had plunged headlong to the instrument. Windows were then opened and the room was soon filled. Again the amplified note was sounded, and instantly in a cloud the mosquitoes, apparently lifeless, were precipitated against the apparatus. It is not alone the sensitiveness of the whorls of fibrils in receiving certain sounds that makes the mosquito so susceptible, but also the tiny creature's special network of nerves for the transmission of the shock. Through the medium of the nerve of the antennæ, beginning at the cerebral ganglion and connecting with branch nerves sending out ramifications in company with the large trachea, sound-vibrations of the character employed in the experiments are instantly communicated to every portion of the mosquito's system. The mosquito is, in other words, thoroughly alert to catch its companion's notes, and so, at the sudden sounding of the note, which, in reality, was an intensified reproduction of some special call in the mosquito song, there resulted the instantaneous plunge of the insects against the musical device.

It was found, moreover, that it was not mere concussion nor volume of sound per se that prostrated the mosquitoes, for the clanging of a bell, much louder in tone, but of a different note, or the discharge of a gun, had no effect. The condition of temporary complete paralysis was manifestly produced by a spasmodic effort of the mosquito's auditory system to respond to the note to which it is by nature attuned, but the sound came with so sudden an intensity that absolute prostration ensued for the time being.

The fact that the mosquitoes were involuntarily and spasmodically attempting to respond to the magnified note of the call peculiar to this family of Diptera is believed to explain, also, why they were hurled with far greater force than gravity alone could exercise upon the body of an inert insect.

How to Give Mosquitoes Nervous Prostration

DISCOVERING that mosquitoes lured and prostrated by certain notes of high vibration were not killed, but simply stunned, and that after the cessation of the tone they would gradually revive and be ready anew to attack victims, arrangements were made to catch them with adhesive fly-paper as they fell. This proved to be very simple and effective. Pursuing the experiments further for the purpose of devising a method of mosquito slaughter that should prove more pleasing to the eye, it has been found practicable to electrocute the mosquitoes as they hurl themselves toward the musical instrument.

This part of the unique method of mosquito extermination consists of a wire screen, similar to a window-screen with the frame removed and mounted on a board. Numbers of wire nails driven between the meshes are connected by electric wires, by which arrangement one electrode of an induction coil is provided, the opposite electrode being formed by the wire screen itself.

Ready now to proceed to the electrocution, the operator presses a button which sounds the note whose vibrations have such potent effect upon mosquitoes and simultaneously turns on a current to the screen spread across the musical instrument. Instantly every mosquito in the room is dashed upon the screen and electrocuted.

As long as these notes were repeated and the windows of the room kept open, mosquitoes continued to be lured to their death from the outside, until the electric screen became a veritable insect abattoir. It was found that the mosquitoes would lunge, rather than fly, as they neared the source of the sound impelling them.

That this novel method of mosquito warfare could be conducted successfully in the open on a large scale, especially at night when mosquitoes are aflight, there seems to be little doubt in the minds of experimenting scientists.

"Science has made wonderful progress since the French failed in their efforts to construct the Panama Canal," said Major J. R. Kean, of the office of the Surgeon-General of the United States Army. "One of the chief causes of the discouragement which finally contributed to the failure of that gigantic enterprise was the impossibility of successfully combating the plague of yellow fever. In spite of the popular apprehension to-day the scientific branches of the United States Government look forward to the construction of the Isthmian Canal as an opportunity to demonstrate to the world that the scourge of yellow fever and malarial fever may be absolutely conquered.

"I am making no chimerical statement when I say that yellow fever can never more gain a foothold in any part of the world over which American authority can be exercised or invoked. The last case of yellow fever in Cuba was cured in April, 1901. Since then that pestilence, which for ages has terrorized the islands of West India, has not recurred. In my opinion this triumph over that hitherto fatal epidemic is one of the greatest achievements in history.

"To-day medical men, entomologists and progressive scientists the world over accept the truth that yellow fever is transmitted by a genus of mosquito. If the sanitary work incident to the construction of the Panama Canal is placed under the charge of the United States Army, we shall organize our system upon the latest scientific plan. The French sought to limit the ravages of yellow fever by isolating victims and carefully destroying supposedly infected clothing and household articles, and fumigating houses from which victims of the plague had been removed. From time immemorial this had been the approved method of fighting fever, and up to two years ago these precautions were recommended by American scientists in their investigations. Notwithstanding all endeavors upon the part of French surgeons and physicians, the mortality of workmen engaged in canal construction was appalling. Thousands of laborers were shipped in to fill up the ranks thinned by yellow fever. But as the system of fighting it was based on a total ignorance of its etiology, the greater the number of recruits the greater was the list of victims.

"Our program will be not to fight the disease by disinfection, for that is unnecessary and of no avail. Yellow fever is not contagious. If a case of yellow fever develops we shall send members of our corps at once to the house or tent where the patient is, and destroy all the possibly infected mosquitoes of the place by burning pyrethrum powder.

"The next step will be to convey the patient to the hospital. No isolation, further than to place him in a bed fixed inside a big wire cage with a five-millimeter mesh, is necessary. By preventing the mosquitoes from attacking the patient, all danger of spreading the malady will be avoided."

All the prophylactic measures which the medical men of the Government will introduce in connection with the construction of the Panama Canal will be based not on theory but successful practice in the West Indies. Other scientists agree with Major Kean in regarding the Isthmian problem as a simple one, and even predict freely that the entire world will very soon be freed from the scourge of yellow fever.

The Kerosene Warfare Against Wrigglers

WHAT will greatly assist in extending belief in the efficacy of the kerosene warfare on mosquitoes is a discovery made in experiments conducted at Washington by the Government entomologist, Dr. L. O. Howard, in regard to the breathing habits of mosquito larvæ. Opponents of the kerosene campaign have pointed out, erroneously it seems, that the oil would not necessarily kill the larvæ, inasmuch as it remained on the surface, while the mosquito-wrigglers could and would develop under water.

Experiments show that though the various species of Culex, such as Culex pungens, Culex pertubans, Culex sollicitans and others of this genus, get their food under water, they are very dependent on constant supplies of oxygen, coming to the surface about once every minute to breathe.

In coming to the surface of water subjected to applications of petroleum the mosquito encounters a film of oil. Unable usually to pierce this, the strange spectacle is presented of an aquatic insect drowning in its own habitat. Science is now, with kerosene treatment of waters, meting out death by drowning to countless billions of these free-swimming larvæ.

Digitized by Google

In the event of the wriggler worming its way through the film of petroleum, it either is overcome and killed by the aroma of the oil which thus acts as an ordinary insecticide, or the actively breathing larva draws a drop of oil into its trachea, which produces inevitable suffocation.

It is by these latter processes, and not by drowning, that the larvæ of Anopheles maculipennis and other species of this malaria-transmitting genus perish. The young of this variety of mosquito, so dangerous to the health of human beings, feed exclusively on the surface, taking no chances at being shut off from the large supply of oxygen indispensable to their development.

This pestilent genus is, therefore, the first to succumb to kerosene applications.

Reports coming into Washington show that the campaign against the mosquito is becoming national in its scope. Many municipalities have either passed or are about to enact mosquito ordinances to compel inhabitants to make scientific warfare upon the insects. In the District of Columbia a person who permits a pool to remain on his premises is subject to a fine of from five to fifty dollars. In some localities in the United States certain days in the month, usually the first and fifteenth, have been set apart as oil days, when ponds and sluggish streams are to be treated with kerosene. Mayors of cities in attempting to introduce mosquito regulations have, in some places, met with public ridicule, but they are persisting in their efforts, and by conducting experiments are demonstrating that the mosquito army of any neighborhood may be subjugated. Public opinion is, therefore, gradually coming around to the practicability of the undertaking. Some cities have appointed inspectors whose duties are to locate mosquito-breeding waters and see that the owners thereof apply the insect-destroying petroleum oils.

Society, also, has voluntarily taken up the work of mosquito extermination, and "mosquito luncheons" and "mosquito teas," at which crusades are organized and methods of attack discussed, have been given. Mr. William C. Whitney, at the Sheepshead Bay Club, very recently gave a mosquito luncheon at which the necessity of organizing to fight mosquitoes at American watering-places was discussed.

Science Formerly Extolled Mosquitoes

ONE of the most interesting things in modern scientific progress is that up to a few years ago it was believed that the mosquito, instead of spreading malaria, helped to check it. Therefore the insects, though acknowledged to be irritating, were classed among beneficial species.

As late as 1888, in a work on natural history written by a corps of learned men, it was announced that the larvæ of mosquitoes, in devouring decaying vegetation, were checking the spread of the miasma which otherwise would arise from these decomposing particles, and as miasma then was believed to be the source of malaria, voracious larvæ were extolled as beneficial scavengers.

To understand the scientific story of mosquitoes and malaria, one should keep in mind that malaria is caused by a little parasite of the order of protozoans, which inhabits the blood and devours its corpuscles. It is, therefore, a microörganism, or animal, and not a plant, as are the bacteria of many diseases.

The great significance of the mosquito discovery in regard to malaria is, as explained by the medical men of the army who have led the scientific world in these practical methods of controlling fevers, that if all the mosquitoes in the world, of the disease-transmitting genus, were destroyed, malaria would speedily become extinct. Experiments prove that the minute malarial protozoan cannot, unaided, develop into full maturity in the human system.

When a mosquito of the genus Anopheles bites a person whose blood is surcharged with these minute creatures, some of the protozoans are swallowed by the insect. Now a strange event takes place. In that mosquito's system the malarial microörganisms, which in the body of a human being would not attain full development, begin to grow amazingly until, in the course of a few days, they become five times their former size. At one point in their career of development they are known as zygotes, and next as blasts. Arriving at a state of maturity, still in the mosquito's body, they select their mates.

In other words, the body of the mosquito of the genus Anopheles is the fireside where the malarial protozoan grows to maturity and where he rears his pestilent brood. After this, the next person that mosquito bites becomes inoculated not with the forms of the original malarial parasite, but with the fully developed protozoa, virulent and voracious, and prepared fully to levy on the vitality of the victim.

How Mosquitoes Travel

FOR years a number of summer resorts have been able to boast of the absence of mosquitoes, but the construction of railways to carry thither pleasure-seekers lured by promise of immunity from these troublesome pests has afforded the insects facilities for invading the hitherto favored regions. Shortly after the railroad reached a seaside watering-place which had been extolled as a favored region unafflicted by mosquitoes, the workmen engaged in the parks, whose signs bore the legend "No Mosquitoes," had to go about with their heads enveloped in netting to protect them from the voracious attacks of the newly-arrived insects. The spectacle had "a very discouraging influence upon visitors," says Doctor Howard. To redeem the reputation of the resort, a few barrels of crude petroleum were scattered on the beach marshes. Mosquitoes disappeared for a time, but the place changed hands and the new owner, regarding the kerosene program as an absurdity, neglected to continue it, and mosquitoes have now returned en masse. One city in West Virginia was accidentally purged of mosquitoes. An oil pipe-line was constructed across the river a mile above the town, and enough petroleum dropped from the pipe into the water to slaughter the mosquitoes which formerly bred in numbers in the stream. Now the people of that city rarely encounter one of the insects.

Mosquitoes are not migrants. Their invasion of new countries is made possible by their taking passage in cars or vessels. In the Hawaiian Islands, where this insect is now a serious pest, it was unknown up to 1826. Before that time, it is claimed, there was no word in the Hawaiian language for mosquito. In that year a vessel landed at Lahaina, on the island of Maui, from San Blas, Mexico. On the night of its arrival, a native informed the late Dr. D. Baldwin, the missionary in charge of the Lahaina station, that a new fly, a singing fly, had bitten him. Not long after the missionary heard a strain which he recognized as that of the mosquito. It was the first time its sinister song had ever been heard in those islands.

Later it was introduced into other parts by ships hailing from the Pacific Coast, but it is interesting to learn that, although the insect multiplied and made life intolerable at times in the immediate vicinity of these ports, it did not travel afield until the developing means of communication enabled it to migrate.

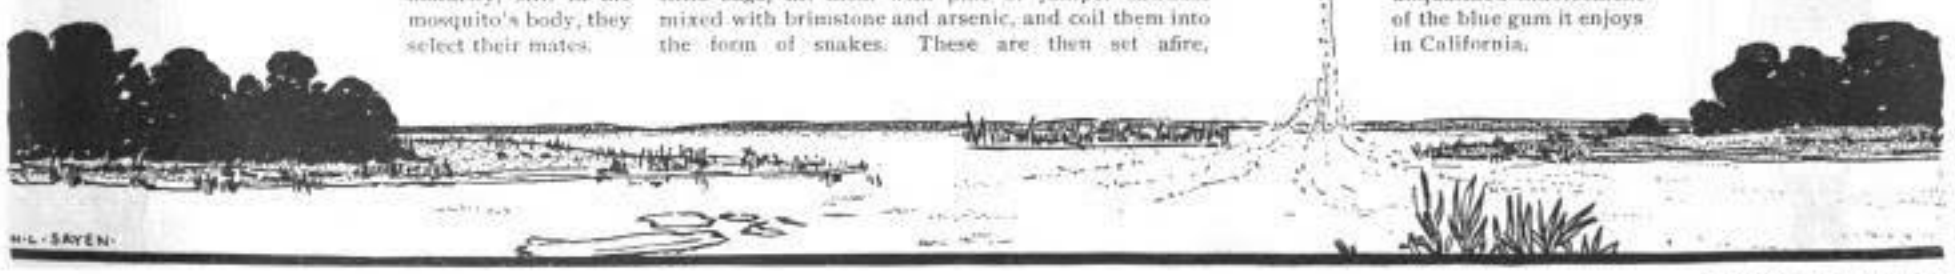
Since the American occupation transportation facilities are offering the mosquito ready opportunity to extend its dominion. As a result of growing inter-island communication, every region in the Hawaiian group has either been invaded or is in danger of invasion, and as the imported insects include the species that transmits yellow fever, the question of how to combat mosquitoes has suddenly become one of serious importance in these new insular possessions of the United States.

Since the public has been informed that mosquitoes transmit malaria and yellow fever, numerous requests have been made upon Doctor Howard, the Government entomologist, the officers of the Marine Hospital Service, and medical men of the Army and Navy, for information as to the best and latest methods of fighting adult mosquitoes. These requests come not only from permanent residents of mosquito-ridden localities, but also from city people contemplating summer trips to seaside or mountain.

There has lately been recommended in this country a method of attack which, it is said, the Chinese have used with success for many centuries. They make little bags, fill them with pine or juniper sawdust mixed with brimstone and arsenic, and coil them into the form of snakes. These are then set afire, creating, it is claimed, widespread mortality among the mosquito genera. These fiery mosquito-slaying dragons may be purchased at the rate of six cents a hundred.

After trying many remedies, the Surgeon-General of the United States Army has adopted as the most effective weapon the ground-up flowers of the pyrethrum plant. The powder should be rolled into a cone, placed on a plate or piece of tiling and set afire. The fumes, which are not harmful to man or the higher animals, and which, in fact, are not even offensive, smelling not unlike incense at a Chinese altar, will kill all the mosquitoes in a room or tent.

Italian scientists experimenting in mosquito-haunted swamps near Rome announce the discovery of a larvicide which has the additional value of affording a sure death to aërial mosquitoes. Subjected in Washington to chemical analysis, this has turned out to be dinitrocresol, a yellow aniline color, the burning of a small quantity of which will kill all the mosquitoes in a room. Like pyrethrum, it is not injurious to people. Chlorine gas, sulphuric oxide and the vapor of chloral are effective, but the last is exceedingly unsafe to use.



A London firm which advertised not long ago for mosquito remedies received an amazing variety of prescriptions. One experimenter reported that he had found that anointing the skin with three parts of refined paraffin mixed with one part of crushed camphor would afford protection. Cotton soaked in oil of cloves and hung on the bed curtains was also recommended. One correspondent who ventured to furnish only his initials advocated as an efficient remedy the placing of a juicy uncooked beefsteak near the bed on retiring. Scientists have not indorsed this program.

The oils of peppermint, lemon juice and vinegar have been recommended, and camphor, if rubbed on the face and hands, discourages the mosquitoes, but only for a limited time, for when its fumes lose their potency the insects return to the attack. Oil of tar, citronella and lavender are also used by some with success, and one experimenter is convinced that the best possible preventive is a mixture of castor oil, alcohol and oil of lavender, to be rubbed on the skin. Experiments show that among the odors camphor, garlic, nutmeg, menthol, turpentine and iodoform all have their virtues; and that the fumes of quassia wood and chrysanthemum powder are efficacious in some localities.

A traveler who has encountered mosquitoes in South Africa, where eucalyptus trees have been transplanted from Australia, writes that he found eucalyptus oil a sovereign remedy for the insects. He claims that if the skin be rubbed with the oil of this remarkable tree and the pillow saturated at night, mosquitoes will not approach the sleeper. From California, where this tree is grown in many sections, reports come that mosquitoes are never found in eucalyptus groves. In some Southwestern localities these immune eucalyptus woodlands are in the midst of regions all other areas of which are grievously afflicted. Travelers overtaken at night in mosquito-haunted willow patches hurry to eucalyptus groves, arriving there not infrequently bitten and blotched almost beyond recognition. Once in the shelter of the gum trees the travelers enjoy absolute security from mosquito attack. These havens of refuge are extolled by scientists and laymen alike in many countries, and where eucalyptus branches are available they are being used as room decorations and bed canopies to keep mosquitoes away.

It is claimed that eucalyptus oil is equally efficient, but its cost, which is usually about one dollar an ounce, is against it. An official in Washington was informed a few days ago that this oil would prove effective in repulsing mosquito assaults. Having in mind the rates paid for kerosene, the gentleman armed himself with a quart bottle and asked the druggist for ten cents' worth of eucalyptus oil. The pharmacist managed to suppress his amusement. When the purchaser got his bottle it did not contain enough oil to cover the bottom.

The testimony from all countries in regard to the efficacy of the eucalyptus remedy is not, however, unanimous. Mexican naturalists complain of a species of mosquito that is actually attracted by eucalyptus leaves, and the experience of Italian investigators has not led them to give the unqualified indorsement of the blue gum it enjoys in California.

If England Put Up the Bars

SOME apprehension was expressed in England lest the adoption of the Chamberlain scheme of imperial protection should lead to retaliation by the United States. Of course the idea of "retaliation" in its literal sense was absurd. We could have had no cause of complaint against Great Britain for paying us the compliment of imitation by adopting our own policy.

But it may be well for our British friends to realize that the effects inherent in the very nature of the Chamberlain scheme, and indeed deliberately sought by it, would be practically equivalent to American retaliation. For instance, Great Britain now buys from us something over a hundred million bushels of wheat a year, divided between grain and flour. It would not, as many think, be impossible, or even very difficult, to secure the production of this whole amount in Canada. It could all be raised without trouble on twelve thousand square miles of land — about one-sixth of the area of Manitoba. But suppose it were, what then?

Seven or eight million acres of American land now devoted to raising wheat for British consumption would be devoted to something else — perhaps to grazing, or to corn and fodder, whereby provisions would be made cheaper in the United States. From fifty to a hundred thousand farmers, farm laborers and mill workers would be forced into other occupations. Many of them no doubt would be employed in manufactures and their products would compete with British goods in all neutral markets. Or perhaps they might stick to wheat-growing, and make up for the loss of their British customers by offering inducements in the way of lower prices to stimulate a larger consumption elsewhere. In any case the result would be that England's industrial rivals, with this country at their head, would have a new and powerful weapon in international competition. Their workers would have cheaper food while the food of the British workman became dearer. If the British manufacturer is barely able to hold his own in South America, Asia and Africa now, what would be his position then?

Yet, unless the Chamberlain plan could produce these results, it would be a failure. Its very purpose is to transfer the business of furnishing Great Britain's food supply from the United States to Canada, and to do it at higher prices, without which the plan would have no attractions for the Canadians. Dearer food for the British workman and the diversion of a considerable amount of American energy from wheat-growing to other forms of productive activity are, therefore, of the essence of the scheme. Whether this prospect would be attractive to the British taxpayer is a question he himself would have to answer.

The Class and Mass Delusion

WE ARE hearing a great deal about "growing distinctions between class and mass" nowadays. Many are "viewing with alarm" and "deeply deploring" such evidences of it as, to use the most often cited instance, the increasing tendency of well-to-do parents to send their children to private school instead of, as formerly, to public school.

There may be, there probably is, something in this. But the viewers with alarm seem to miss the point. It is not the "mass" that is going to suffer by this imported passion for exclusiveness; it is the "class."

Democracy is as much to-day the law of our social order as gravitation is of our physical order. Any plan to defy democracy in the interest of certain people has about the same chances of success that a plan to suspend the law of gravitation in certain circumstances would have. Those who don't like democracy will, if they are wise, either leave the country or adjust themselves and their children to its conditions. For, if they stay and put themselves out of harmony with the existing and unalterable order, their children will be punished for it, though they themselves, through obedience in their earlier lives, may escape the worst consequences of their folly.

The part of the oncoming generation that is trained in democracy is the part that will survive and prosper and progress. The part that is bred in exclusiveness and caste-feeling is going to be bitterly discontented and deplorably unprogressive certainly, and in all probability, except in a few rare cases, downright unprosperous.

The Other Side of Boodling

IT HAS been a bad year for the boodlers and grafters in every part of the country. The mayor of a large city, certain members of a legislature, a few aldermen, officials connected with an important department of the Government and others are either in jail serving their sentences, or are out on bail waiting for new trials, or are under indictment with the probability of conviction. No six months in the country's history has seen such a legal round-up of political malefactors. The result is bound to be useful, for the penitentiary is an object-lesson that forces its impressiveness upon even the crudest understanding.

But there is another side of boodling that does not come out quite so conspicuously, but which is, after all, the most important part of the problem. The foolish little rascals who are getting caught are the effect; the cause is to be found in the proclivity of corporations of large capital and small conscience to buy legislatures and contracts without regard to the law or to the right. If they did not exist, if they did not pay the money, if they did not work their schemes, boodling would not live for a single minute. It is the argument of the corporations that they must use these means to gain their ends. They shift the responsibility by declaring that the only way to get their bills and favors through is to buy them through. They express the deepest regret over the alleged necessity, but they fall back on the consolation that they are practical men dealing with conditions and not with ethics.

It is passing sad that the boodling corporations cannot be hauled into court and made to suffer for their sins. But after all, we need not be hopeless in the matter. Justice has a way of reaching results outside of the law even when it is balked in the law. We have several instances of recent occurrence. Those who manage corporations have confessed that the price of boodling has risen to such figures that they can no longer afford it. The man who accepted ten dollars at first soon raised his price to a hundred and on upward to thousands. The price of an election, which was cheap, grew like Jonah's gourd overnight. The expense of the whole business has multiplied in every direction. In one city a corporation has published a statement that it will no longer put up money for party managers or legislatures, and that it will take its chances without spending a dollar for corrupt purposes.

These eleventh-hour confessions are entitled to no praise. They come because they have been forced by the cost of their own wickedness. But they show the other side of boodling with a clearness that is as significant as it is conclusive. And the satisfaction of it is in the proclamation that the corrupt dollar has its limitations and that the buying of weak men may become too expensive even for the plutocrats.

It was Balzac, was it not, who wrote the story showing the terrible revenge of the coward? It is the corrupt corporation that tells the story of the enormous cost of its own creature — the plundering politician.

Our Duty at Panama

AS WE push forward to the building of an Isthmian Canal in the tropics we should not forget certain historic truths:

First — In all time, ancient and modern, no work of any size has ever been done in or near the tropics except by slaves under the lash.

Second — The Isthmus of Panama is near the heart of the tropics and has one of the very worst climates in the world, both as to heat and as to disease.

Third — The Suez Canal lies far to the north of the Panama latitude, has a far better climate, was a comparatively easy work. Yet in building it the lash swung all day long and the wretched slaves died like flies. Had Egypt not then been furious despotism, the canal probably could not have been built.

Fourth — All the labor for Panama must be imported, will therefore be unacclimated. In digging the part which we have now bought the French imported their labor, practically enslaved it, with difficulty resisted the scandal and outcry caused in France by the pestilence-like mortality — the slavery was winked at, as in the case of Suez.

If we can keep laborers alive at Panama, can keep them at work without enslaving them and driving them to their tasks under the lash, we shall achieve a wonderful triumph.

Our contracts with the sub-contractors must have very carefully-drawn labor clauses, not as to hours or wages, but as to slavery and the lash.

Some Deceptive Figures

IN THE reaction from the panic over the "American invasion" English writers are taking much comfort from a recent article in one of the reviews showing that on a per capita basis England is still at the head of the list of trading nations and the United States at the foot. They think that this shows that the commercial prosperity of America has been greatly overrated.

It would be cruel to deprive a friend of such a consolation as this, but possibly a little further reflection may show the optimistic Britons one or two points which they have overlooked. It is true that the foreign trade of the United States is less in proportion to the population than that of England. But carry the idea a little further. Suppose the United States included all of North and South America, would not its foreign trade be smaller than it is now? Suppose it included Europe? Suppose it included the whole world — then it would not have any foreign trade at all, and, presumably, would be sunk in the depths of commercial stagnation.

It is a simple fact, although one that apparently is not as obvious to some minds as it should be, that the larger and the more self-sufficing a given commercial area is, the less need its people will have to trade outside their borders. Undoubtedly the volume of products passing in and out of the State of New York is larger than that passing in and out of the whole United States. In other words, the State of New York, if its trade were computed separately, would rank as one of the greatest commercial powers of the world. It may be doubted whether its commerce would not match that of England herself, not only per capita but absolutely. The fact that the greater part of this commerce is domestic does not alter its character as an evidence of business power and energy.

The real test of a nation's commercial activity is not its foreign exchanges, nor even the trade from district to district, or from city to city. It is the trade from man to man — the imports and exports of the individual. It is the trade itself, not the question whether it crosses this or that political boundary. And of this primary, fundamental trade, the true measure is the rate of wages. The men who sell their labor at the highest prices can make the largest purchases.

several hundred thousands a year, each of whom has his or her circle of "worthy poor," or gives regularly to those myriad petty enterprises of misdirected or barefacedly fraudulent charity which enlist the activities of so many "workers."

The women are the most persistent and unreasonable offenders in this respect. Partly through idleness, partly through a craving to have occupation and a sense of usefulness, partly through profound pity for their apparently less fortunate sisters, they pour out capital for pauper-plants and search diligently for "worthy poor" to pauperize.

Those who have money, a great deal of money, have a feeling of the horror of being without it which those who have little or no money never have. They who dream of the Wolf have a shaking, shivering, nightmarish terror of him which they who have felt his teeth would laugh at. The second and after generations of the rich, never having learned how to earn a living, feel fundamentally helpless; the familiar companions of the Wolf hate and fear him, but through long acquaintance they have learned from him courage and resource.

The Poverty-Stricken Millionaires

THERE is no notable tendency to increased benevolence in the second and after generations of the very rich, under the stimulus of the huge givings by increasing numbers of self-made multi-millionaires. Two other tendencies, however, are marked. Many of the long-very-rich New Yorkers are steadily more shy of any and all kinds of giving. No doubt at bottom this is due to increasing selfishness, increasing absorption in amusements of the wholly selfish kinds. It costs more and more every year to play the rich man's part; more and more imagination is brought to bear in developing it both by rich men eager to find new ways of showing off and by ingenious poor men inventing new ways of making a living out of the rich upon whose extravagances they thrive. The rich man, even where his income is huge, is often pinched. He hates to give—he may find that his giving has compelled him to forego a most attractive investment or has compelled him to abstain from some new expensive luxury or pleasure. He hoards to be ready for such emergencies. Then, if he has several children, he wants to leave each of them as rich as possible so that they can all live in the style to which they have been accustomed, the style in which their friends and associates live.

For reverence for wealth you must look among the long-very-rich. Those who pass Mammon's statue with a nod or a half-ashamed crook of a reluctant knee will have the pleasure of seeing very, very many of them flat in the dust, noses plowing it, and not a bit ashamed.

The Reverse of the Shield

INCREASING reverence for money, the increasing size of the fortune one must have to be honored for wealth, the increasing possibilities of extravagance, all these unite to create this tendency to less giving of every kind.

The other tendency in the second and after generations of the very rich is, in sharp contrast, distinctly attractive. It is a tendency to study out ways of being genuinely helpful in the only possible way of helpfulness—the general elevation of the taste and tone and capacity and aspiration of their fellow-beings. Mr. Morgan and Mr. George Vanderbilt—to single out two from many, at the risk of being too personal in the effort to illustrate a point—are types of this class. Mr. Morgan is collecting, for what cannot but be public purposes, works of art of various kinds, and also rare books and manuscripts—a work which, to be done on the scale to produce quick and appreciable effects, must be done by a single rich man working, intelligently and carelessly of money-cost, through the best obtainable agents. Mr. Vanderbilt, by practicing forestry and farming on a scale possible only to a rich man with leisure, and by striving to make his results both practical and public, is doing a valuable work for the most important as well as the most ancient and most backward industry in the world. The county fairs everywhere throughout the country are being attended by Farmer Vanderbilt, and the local farmers whom his prize products beat are learning, are being waked up. These men are using their surplus and their brains to give their fellow-men ideas—and ideas never pauperize.

If the very rich don't give, the shout is "Stingy! Miser!" If they do give, the shout is "Self-advertiser! Pauperizer!" And often in both cases there is much justice in criticism. But any one who has a little imagination and is not ruled by prejudices or by sentimentalities will soon see how difficult it is for a generous man of wealth, with an honest desire to help his fellow-beings, to know just what to do. Beyond question, many of the very rich New Yorkers who have ceased from all kinds of giving have done so simply because they feared they would do more harm than good. "I've come to the conclusion," said one of them not long ago, "that the only thoroughly safe way to help others is by investing my money as intelligently as I can in enterprises that offer opportunities for the willing to help themselves." And there's no disputing the fact that business is benevolence of the highest kind. It is a case of give and take, value for value.

But the very rich men and women of the type of Collector Morgan and Farmer Vanderbilt probably are the advance guard of the philanthropists of the future. There are many of them now, many in New York, many in other parts of the country, especially in the Middle West. And they do not make paupers, nor do they lay themselves open to the reproach of spending their incomes in the vulgar, selfish life of "gentlemen."

But—it is doubly unfortunate that the rank and file of the very rich should be learning the slow and painful lessons of how, when and where to give, in a city crowded with unassimilated foreigners whose heads are full of caste notions.

And the great problem of New York to-day is not "the slums" but the pauper-makers.

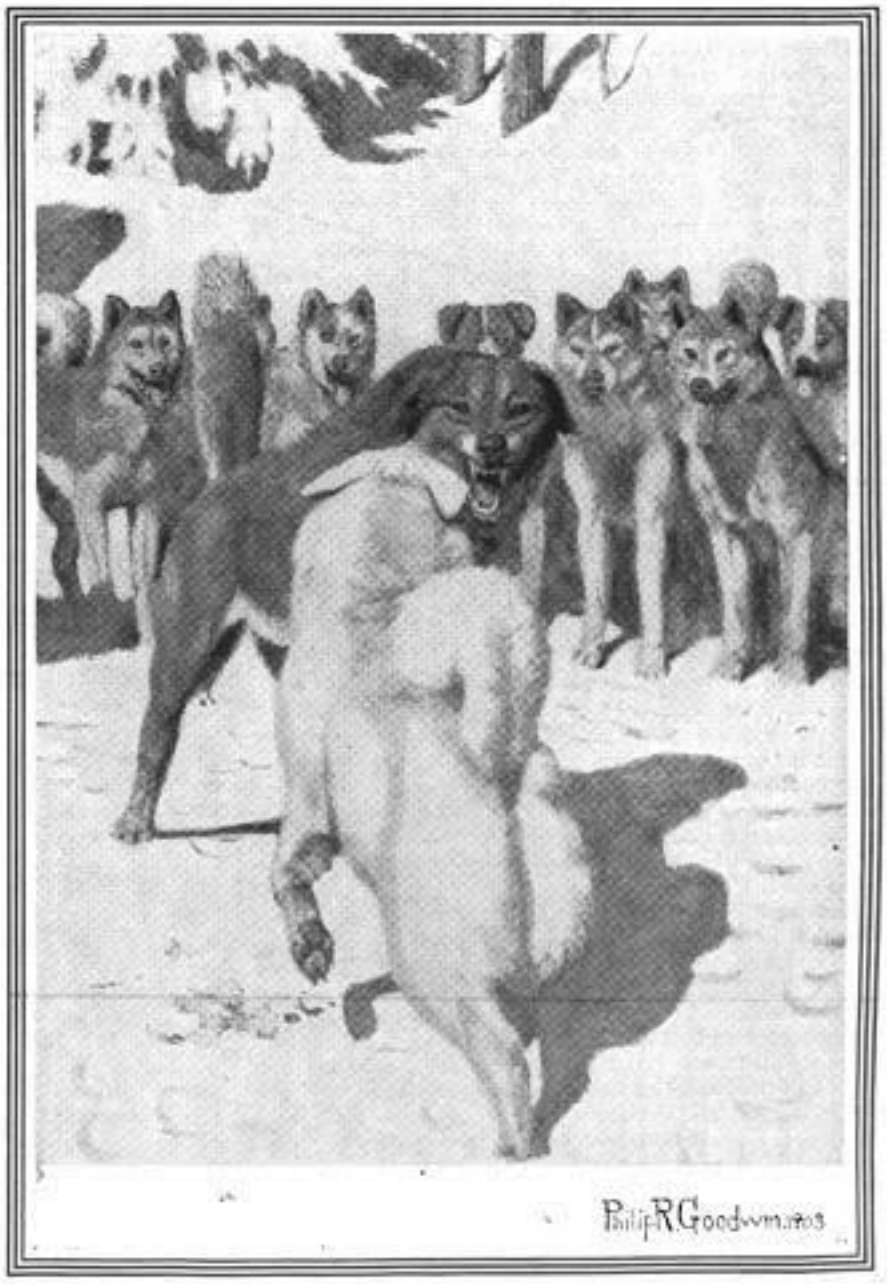
THE CALL OF THE WILD

By JACK LONDON

III—The Death Struggle

THE dominant primordial beast was strong in Buck, and under the fierce conditions of trail life it grew and grew. Yet it was a secret growth. His new-born cunning gave him poise and control. He was too busy adjusting himself to the new life to feel at ease, and not only did he not pick fights, but he avoided them whenever possible. A certain deliberateness characterized his attitude. He was not prone to rashness and precipitate action; and in the bitter hatred between him and Spitz he betrayed no impatience, shunned all offensive acts.

On the other hand, possibly because he divined in Buck a dangerous rival, Spitz never lost an opportunity of showing his teeth. He even went out of his way to bully Buck, striving constantly to start the fight which could end only in the death of one or the other. Early in the trip this might have taken place had it not been for an unwonted accident. At the end of this day they made a bleak and miserable camp on the shore of Lake Le Barge. Driving snow, a wind that cut like a white-hot knife, and darkness had forced them to grope for a camping-place. They could hardly have fared worse. At their backs rose a perpendicular wall of rock, and Perrault and François were compelled to make their fire and spread their sleeping-robes on the ice of the lake itself. The tent they had discarded at Dyea in order to travel light. A few sticks of driftwood furnished them with a fire that thawed down through the ice and left them to eat supper in the dark.



Close in under the sheltering rock Buck made his nest. So snug and warm was it that he was loth to leave it when François distributed the fish which he had first thawed over the fire. But when Buck finished his ration and returned he found his nest occupied. A warning snarl told him that the trespasser was Spitz. Till now Buck had avoided trouble with his enemy, but this was too much. The beast in him roared. He sprang upon Spitz with a fury which surprised them both, and Spitz particularly, for his whole experience with Buck had gone to teach him that his rival was an unusually timid dog who managed to hold his own only because of his great weight and size.

François was surprised, too, when they shot out in a tangle from the disrupted nest and he divined the cause of the trouble. "A-a-ah!" he cried to Buck. "Gif it to heem, by Gar! Gif it to heem, the dirty t'ief!"

Buck was nothing loth. He was crying with sheer rage and eagerness as he circled back and forth for a chance to spring in. Spitz was no less eager and no less cautious, as he likewise circled back and forth for the advantage. But it was then that the unexpected happened, the thing which projected their struggle for supremacy far into the future, past many a weary mile of trail and toil.

An oath from Perrault, the resounding impact of a club upon a bony frame, and a shrill yelp of pain heralded the breaking forth of pandemonium. The camp was suddenly discovered to be alive with skulking furry forms—starving huskies, four or five score of them, who had scented the camp from some Indian village. They had crept in while Buck and Spitz were fighting, and when the two men sprang among them with stout clubs they showed their teeth and fought back. They were crazed by the smell of the food. Perrault found one with head buried in the grub-box. His club landed mightily on the gaunt ribs, and the grub-box was capsized on the ground. On the instant a score of the famished brutes were scrambling for the bread and bacon. The clubs fell upon them unheeded. They yelped and howled under the rain of blows, but struggled none the less madly till the last crumb had been devoured.

In the mean time the astonished team-dogs had burst out of their nests only to be set upon by the fierce invaders. Never had Buck seen such dogs. It

Some Startling Facts

About That Twentieth Century Profession—Advertising. Big Salaries Paid—Bright Prospects for Beginners

A billion a year! That sum, The New York Times tells us, is spent in this country for advertising. The business has had a most remarkable growth during the past ten years. One hundred thousand men and women are now engaged in directing the expenditure of that vast sum. There's a fast growing need for people qualified to do this work well. Many are now

I invite my pupils to ask questions with the assurance that they will be clearly answered.

Waking up to the Fact that it's a very remunerative and uncrowded profession.

Next fall and winter there will surely be any number of good positions seeking competent ad-writers. Begin now and I'll have you ready for one of them.

Now, remember the demand is not for those who can string together a few high-sounding words, and who have but a smattering of types. The market is full of that kind. But storekeepers and manufacturers everywhere are seeking really well-informed men and women to prepare and place their business-bringing publicity—well-trained men and women who know how the subject can be most profitably handled. In short, for the kind of advertising people I am graduating.

Just a moment! Is that only idle brag—talk of the same character as that you've read perhaps many times before? Then let the records prove the truth of that statement by the successes my graduates have uniformly made. And this interesting and important fact: This school because of dissatisfaction with its system of instruction. It has enrolled many who have experimented with other courses.

That's not because as an advertising man I am better than all others—there are doubtless many men that are abler than I. But my system is superior—superior, because by it pupils are guaranteed personal instruction; because I am conscientiously and constantly studying the requirements of each pupil; because that pupil is taught as if he, or she, were the only one I had.

Of course, by my methods I can't teach as many people as some institutions. Nor do I intend to try. I am seeking by this announcement to enroll just enough to keep me busy this summer. Do you wish to become a pupil? Write to me and we'll talk about the terms.

deficient moral sense in John—or as Hegel would put it——"

They led him away. He was right about John, as it proved.

"And yet, you know," he said to the head attendant when they took him to the insane asylum, where he is to-day, "I believe I fooled my sense of oughtness worst of all!" and laughed heartily over his discovery.

Now, you see, if he had only mingled more with other fellows and had taken a little exercise now and then—but you see what comes of too much study. Why are you wriggling around now? A great mistake if I think you are poling too much? But can't I see with my own eyes the dark rings under yours? Polers so often pretend not to be polers. There was Poler Perkins, and Poler Stevenson, and Poler Stacy. Poler Stacy's case was quite different.

What's that? Oh, you want to tell me something? Not very polite for a kid brother, seems to me; you'll have to wait till I finish. Poler Stacy got sick of the monotony of poling and the ignominy of being called a poler. One evening he was invited to dine at one of the upper-class clubs and tried to give the illusion of being a good fellow, as he conceived it; told a lot of futile little stories and performed sorry antics, which certainly made the fellows laugh, and he thought they were laughing at his humor, not his absurdity—until on leaving the club he heard a bit of conversation through an open window which opened his eyes and kept them open all that night; with the result that along about noon of the next day, having cut all his lectures meanwhile, he was desperate. "They smile at you, do they?" he said to himself in the glass; "well, we'll show 'em, we'll show 'em once for all!" and he stalked out of the room, slammed the door and, scowling devilishly, strode over to a place called "Scuds," where certain of his classmates were wont to gather of an afternoon in spring term for a glass of bock beer.

They were amazed when they saw Stacy march in, and they looked it.

"I'll show you," thought Stacy, and hammered on a table for a waiter, scowling terribly.

"Beer, sir?" said the waiter, mopping the table.

"Beer! No. I want some whisky."

Then he buried his face in a newspaper to hide the blush upon it. Also, he thought that this would look like the real thing, especially as he had put his feet on a neighboring chair.

"Here! why do you bring me a little glass like that?" he growled at the waiter. "I want a big glass." Suddenly the others seemed to see something funny out of the window.

"A high ball, sir?"

"A what?" The thing outside was still funnier.

"A high ball?"

Stacy did not know whether or not the waiter was impudently trying to guy him, but he was sure the others were listening. He would show himself the match of any waiter. "Bring me a hot Scotch," he said calmly, and tried to look abstracted. He had read about "hot Scotches" in novels.

"That ought to impress them," he thought; and so it did, for it was a warm, sunny day.

They were still more impressed when he ordered a second and a third and a fourth. But each time it was a different impression. At first it seemed ludicrous, then pathetic, and finally quite disgusting.

What's the matter, Dick? Don't you want to hear about this? It is queer, I admit. So I'll cut it short. There could not have been any fun in it even for him, for he immediately—what do you call it?—"drew a blank," fell into a stupor. As soon as it was dusk they walked him over to his room. They opened the door for him and he staggered across the threshold and fell into the arms of his mother. She had been waiting to see him for over an hour.

Under the circumstances you might think she would blame it upon his "evil companions" who brought him home, and who stayed to help her. But she did not. She just stood there stunned and broken-hearted and kept saying, as she fanned him, "Why, he's the pride and ambition of the family—the pride and ambition of the family," and all that, and told them how she had always trusted her boy—and all that. It was a ghastly scene and they only perspired worse than the drunken man, and made no reply. Perhaps they were thinking——

Why, what's the matter, Dick? Am I taking too much of your time? You want to speak to me about something? Well, fire away; it's your turn now. Won a prize—and you want me to break it gently? No? What is it, then? Anything to do with that cigarette you're tearing to bits?

What? . . . So that's it! . . . Go on . . . Out with it . . . And you took too much . . . Summoned before the faculty this afternoon, eh? . . . And they are to give you their decision to-morrow . . . um . . . No, I don't think they will dismiss you from college entirely—if this is really the first time . . . They have a right to suspend you, though . . .

If you don't mind, I don't care to hear how it happened—won't interest me a bit. Maybe it was because you wanted to show the gang, like Poler Stacy. I'd hate to think so, especially since it would be worse in your case, because you are popular and prominent already, and, moreover, know that that sort of thing does not endear you to anybody. Maybe it was because you were temporarily insane, like that young lawyer, and wanted to show yourself what it was like; only there would be less excuse for you to act like an idiot because you are a thoroughly healthy, normal person. Or maybe you just plain forgot and abused conviviality, which is too fine a thing to be intrusted to weaklings or brutes. Or maybe you don't know just how you happened to make a d——d fool of yourself. At any rate, it's none of my business and I don't want to know. No excuse would cut any ice with me, and what's more, they are all too old to have any effect upon the Discipline Committee. I'm mighty glad you did not offer any of them. I'm glad you just said it was so and that you had no explanation for it. They rather liked that.

You needn't look surprised. I knew all about it when I came here this evening. That's why I came. But you were too much up in the air at first. To tell the truth, you weren't very anxious to speak of it to me. So I tried to take your mind off the subject for a while to get you calmed down by telling you of a man in a much worse hole than yours. Then I told you about Poler Stacy's hard luck to bring you back to business.

What? No, I haven't any influence with the faculty; nothing I could do or say would affect their decision one way or the other. If they make up their minds to ship you, you go.

Rather steep price, you say, to pay for your fun? Huh, I haven't been thinking of you. I was thinking that you might not be the one to pay dearest for it. What do I mean? 'Tisn't the sort of thing one likes to speak of out loud; I was merely thinking—oh, well, to be sure, it can't be as bad as Poler Stacy. She won't actually see you that way. But, all the same, if an official notice comes home from the dean: "I regret to be obliged to inform you that your son is hereby suspended for a term of three weeks for——" Pretty tough in that way, isn't it? All out of a clear sky, too. Yep, pretty tough. You've got such a good rep. at home, you know.

Fool? Well, I should say so. Yes, all that too—yes, go on, it's good, sound, healthy remorse. But if you know it already why do you ask me? I'll say yes to everything you say about yourself, but, seems to me, that doesn't do much good. What's up to you now is to see that it does not happen again as long as you are a boy at college whose beer as well as his books are paid for by his daddy. How about that business aspect of it, Dick? 'Tisn't quite square, is it?

No, I wouldn't quite say that your life is ruined. There have been worse things in history. You have a chance. "All is not lost." Those two men I told you about—one of them of course is done for, but the other has become a useful and respected citizen. So there's a chance even for you. I still believe in you.

Yes, the notice from the dean will surely go home—if you do. It will get there ahead of you, if it goes at all. But mabye it's not going. No, I did not say they were going to suspend you. I merely pointed out what might happen. Now, as a matter of fact, I understand that they are going to let you off because this is your first offense. Yes, that's straight. No, I had nothing to do with it. They liked the way you talked—and mean to give you a chance. Yes, I should think you would feel relieved. But remember what it means if you ever make a fool of yourself again. Remember who will be made to suffer for it. That is the reason I ask you not to let it happen again. And that is the reason, and the only reason, I believe you won't let it happen again. Your "sense of oughtness" wouldn't keep you straight any more than the fear of filling a drunkard's grave or ruining your health, or even the fear of being ridiculous like Poler Stacy. But this other thing will, I think. Now I'll trouble you for a pipe.

Literary Folk Their Ways and Their Work

A Fable for Reviewers

THE other day I dreamed a dream. Before me sat a reviewer of books. And he was reviewing three novels. And methought that the authors of the three novels stood outside his window and writhed because of his reviews; for they were venomous.

And I said to the reviewer: "Why do you say these things of these books? that this one is unworthy to be read and that is too dry and that the other is pernicious, and that all are utter rot? Do you not see the authors writhing outside of your window?"

And he made answer: "I had not seen them, but let them writhe. I have read two hundred books in twenty days and have written reviews of them all, and if I can cause an author to writhe by what I say of his book it is no more than simple justice."

Then in my dream I spoke further to the reviewer while the authors were still writhing outside his window, and I said: "Suppose that you had written a book and these authors were called upon to review it. What would you that they should do: cause you to writhe at their maledictions or to beam at their appreciations?"

And the reviewer said: "I had not thought on that side of it, but of a truth I would like better to beam than to writhe."

"Now for your sins," said I, "I will change you to a writer of advertisements and I will change these authors to merchants who are striving to make an honest living."

Then in my dream I waved my finger at him and he became a writer of advertisements and wrote:

"Mr. Brown's new automobile marks the climax of his lack of inventive faculty. It is badly constructed, its motive power is poor, and it is absolutely unworthy of public patronage."

Of the next merchant he wrote:

"White's new cracker, I Want One, is on the market, and it is the dryest, most insipid thing that was ever crumbled up for chickens. It would mar the lunch of any picnic, and no man having tasted one will ever buy another unless he wants to choke to death."

Of the third merchant's product he wrote:

"Mr. Green has introduced a new tonic which he calls Bray-supp. I have no hesitation in saying that it is a noxious dose and that its influence cannot fail to be harmful to all those taking it. One bottle may be bought by a wise man; if he buys a second he is a fool."

When he had made an end of writing I looked to see if the former authors, now merchants, were writhing and they were not. They were all empowering lawyers to begin suits for libel against the writer of advertisements, and he was writhing rhythmically.

Then in mercy I changed him back to a reviewer and I turned the merchants into authors busy with new books.

And the reviewer said: "Of a surety you have opened my eyes. I now see that I have no business to be injuring the chances of success of other men of like fashion with myself. Hereafter I will review only those books that I like."

And days passed by in my dream and the reviewer read and read and read.

But his pen was idle.

MOTHER

By Zona Gale

I wish I had said more. So long, so long
About your simple tasks I watched you, dear;
I knew you craved the words you did not hear;
I knew your spirit, brave and chaste and strong,
Was wistful that it might not do the wrong;
And all its wistfulness and all its fear
Were in your eyes whenever I was near.
And yet you always went your way with song.

O prodigal of smiles for other eyes
I led my life. At last there came a day
When with some careless praise I turned away
From what you fashioned for a sweet surprise.
Ah, now it is too late for me to pour
My vase of myrrh — would God I had said more!

The BLOCK LIGHT for HOME use is now ready.

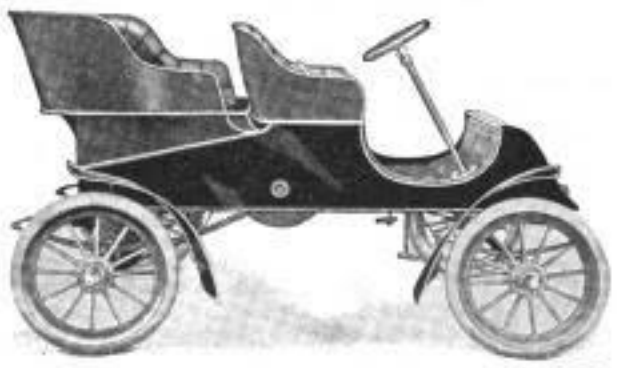
Without question the greatest light science and inventive genius has ever produced. The Block Light Burner can be used with city gas, natural gas and gasoline gas. Easy to adjust — once adjusted cannot be disarranged. It is guaranteed to produce a light of 150 candle power — equal to ten incandescent electric light bulbs.

The Block Light is a pure, radiant, white light, soft and mellow, casting no shadow, and restful to the eyes. It consumes one part of gas to eight parts of air, which means

Four Times the Light AT LESS THAN Half the Cost



The Block Light will give four times more light than any other light in your home, no matter what its name or nature. Any other light you may have is a gas waster compared with the Block Light. As a special introductory offer we will send, express prepaid, for $1.50 the complete Block Light — Burner, Mantle and Globe — which you can attach to any gas jet in your home and test it. Money refunded if you are not thoroughly satisfied.

When ordering please state the character of gas you are using.

POWERFUL

A Pure Food Drink Has Great Sustaining Power.

The sustaining power of Postum Coffee when properly cooked is greater than most people imagine, and it is well illustrated in the story told by a young Texas woman, who says: "I almost lived on Postum Cereal Coffee for over a month and there was over a week I did not eat anything at all but just drank the food drink Postum and yet I grew stronger and gained weight.

"Our family physician examined Postum and decided to use it altogether in place of coffee. We all think it has no equal as a nourishment for the sick, for beside being pleasant to the taste it is so strengthening. My father and mother have always been coffee drinkers and suffered all kinds of troubles from the coffee until about a year ago a neighbor was praising Postum and mother decided to try it.

"They improved at once and have drank Postum ever since and mother, who used to be bothered with nervousness and sleeplessness particularly, is in splendid health now. She says the change came entirely from drinking Postum and leaving off coffee." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

FOREST FIRES

THE forests are burning. The air is spicy with the smell of burning wood and leaves. At night long lines of fire blaze tremulously against the black background of sky.

Safe in the retreat of a country house, the early summer visitor regards these sights and smells as one of the attractions of the landscape; the villager as the inevitable accompaniment of the season. Every spring the same spicy vapors, the same glimmering lights on the hills. All up and down the Atlantic Coast, over thousands and thousands of square miles of forest, the same sort of fires are burning, and people are saying that spring is well advanced, because spring and forest fires go together.

What a change of sentiment there would be if people should climb the hills, penetrate the burned forest and find out what has actually taken place there! The charred boles of the trees, with the leaves on the lower limbs wilted and drooping; the underbrush and shrubs all gone; the earth black, reeking with smoke, with naked stones projecting — such sights would give them only a faint idea of the great harm done. The forest is not dead, but serious harm has been done it. The growth of the trees has been checked, their vitality lowered; they are less able to resist the next fire and more liable to be overturned by the wind. Holes have been burned in the bark: disease will enter; wood and bark beetles will get in; and sooner or later the injured tree will succumb, to make more litter and furnish breeding-places for more disease. Moreover, many small and tender seedlings that were coming up to form the next crop are entirely dead. The leaves, the moss and the humus (decomposed vegetable matter) have been burned away. The naked soil, dry and unprotected, is no longer able to retain much moisture; and when rain falls, the ground washes.

And this destruction is going on all over the East, the South, the West and the North, at one season or other, while little attention is paid it until it begins to threaten improved property. This year the East has suffered most. The reports show an unusually heavy destruction of property. The woods were dry and the small fires, neglected as they always are, quickly became conflagrations. In the Adirondacks, fires, besides burning over thousands of acres of forest lands, have destroyed summer hotels, cottages, lodges, farmhouses and cattle; have driven out the game from game preserves, and have even claimed human victims. Long Island for weeks was ablaze with forest fires from one end to the other, and only the efforts of the farmers and owners of private estates, roused by the threatened danger of their improved property, prevented the burning over of all the timberlands. In Pennsylvania, especially in the oil regions, the fires were very bad; millions in property have been destroyed and hundreds of refugees have been driven into the larger towns. Several sawmills and coal plants have been destroyed. A recent dispatch from Montreal read that "terrible forest fires are raging" about fifty miles north of that place and that a village had been destroyed. "The inhabitants are leaving their animals and possessions a prey to the flames and are fleeing farther north for safety."

A few months ago an agent for the Bureau of Forestry, happening by chance to be in Southern Washington and Northern Oregon at a time when an extensive forest fire was burning there, was ordered to make a careful study of the damage done. After several weeks of investigation he returned a report, based on a field survey of the burned districts, declaring that the damage amounted to twelve million dollars. This fire occurred in a single limited district and lasted about a week. If it had not been accompanied by a considerable loss of life it would have passed with little notice except by the lumbermen.

The Bureau of Forestry, calculating from the very meagre and imperfect data at hand, has declared that the annual damage from forest fires amounts to at least fifty million dollars. Staggering as the sum appears, it is undoubtedly far too small. The damage to improved property, live stock, and to timber which at present has a merchantable value, does not nearly cover the case against forest fires. There remain to be considered the incalculable destruction to the young growth which at present has no market value but would ultimately become valuable, the timber diseases that follow fire, the drying up of springs and the ruin of watercourses, to the irreparable harm of the irrigation lands.

The comparative immunity of European forests from fire furnishes an instructive contrast to our own conditions. Doctor Fernow states that within the last twenty-five years the acreage destroyed by fire in Prussia and Bavaria rarely exceeds .005 per cent. each year of the total forest area under State control. So small is the fire damage in the German forests that there are several insurance companies which do a business in insuring forests from fire at a rate of from .45 to .4 on the thousand. The rates vary with the age, species (conifers are more likely to burn than hardwoods), and with local danger. In the United States forest-fire insurance is comparatively unknown. The risk is so great as to make necessary rates that would be prohibitive.

The difficulties of thorough protection of forests from fire in the United States can be appreciated only by those who have had to deal with the problem. Such protection is, in many cases, not to be recommended. It would be costly out of all proportion to the returns it would secure. But wherever the conditions are such that fire protection is an absolute necessity for the perservation of timber that is valuable either for its own sake or for its influence on the waterflow, some scheme of fire prevention should be put into operation. In well-settled communities at least ninety per cent. of the forest fires that occur could be either prevented altogether or put out before they had done considerable harm. The best plan, either in State lands or on private estates, is always to make some one directly responsible for fire damage who shall put out the flames before they have gained great headway. Every great forest fire was a little fire until it was neglected, and might easily have been suppressed if some one had seen it and been responsible for it. A little back-firing, or a fire line, cleared and well guarded, would have stopped the mischief.

In India the English foresters found conditions for the prevention of forest fires far more unfavorable than they are in this country, yet the forest fires there have been greatly reduced. The annual expense of protecting from fire 30,000 square miles in India is never more than ten dollars a mile; yet in 1895 only eight per cent. of the forest was damaged. Forest protection on private and State lands in this country must come by State legislation, of which there has been very little, and that little has, for the most part, failed of success. Pennsylvania furnishes a notable exception. There forest-fire laws are based on the principle that it is better to prevent fires first than to attempt to put them out afterward. An efficient system of employing firewardens who are responsible for all forest fires occurring within their districts is supplemented by the law requiring county commissioners to appoint men to ferret out and punish persons who cause forest fires.

Fire is the great problem with which forestry has to deal. In every working plan for the management of a tract of timberland the forester has to reckon with the fire peril. Unless he can assure an adequate system of protection at a cost low enough to justify his employing it, he cannot recommend any system of forest management. The matter of fire protection limits every scheme of conservative management.

Such management is based on the idea of taking less now for the forest in order that more may be secured later; and if there is great danger that later fire may destroy the forest, it would be better to lumber the whole tract immediately than to take chances of losing the producing capital.

Induced by the great need of a thorough and systematic study of the fire problem, the Bureau of Forestry sent out last spring several parties into the South and West to make accurate studies on the ground of forest fires, to learn how they are caused, how much damage they do, and how they may be prevented or put out. When the study has been completed the Bureau will be in a position to recommend forest-fire legislation to each of the States studied that desires such information.

The Countess Decides

"Now, madam, what have you to say? Are you the Countess of Croydon?"

The young lady's eyes had opened as he read. Parker's countenance remained unmoved, as if she were a feminine sphinx.

"What is the rest of the letter?" asked the girl.

"That is neither here nor there."

"It is quite evidently there. May I suggest that it is an inventory of the Countess' possessions? Are you chagrined to learn that your proposal was wasted on the undeserving?"

"I asked you if you are the Countess of Croydon?"

"I reply that I never said I was."

"That reply will not do, madam. The honor of my family is at stake."

"Your family has nothing to do with me."

"I begin to suspect that my family has indeed nothing to do with one who pretended to be a member of it."

"Your memory fails you. I disclaimed all relationship when you asserted it."

"I asserted it under the supposition that you were the Countess."

"Very well. No harm is done. I did not take advantage of your offer. I never said I was the Countess, and so long as I pay my hotel bill no one has a right to interfere."

"You are very much mistaken. Such masquerading is not to be tolerated."

"I am leaving here the day after to-morrow and I sail from Suez a week from to-day. I ask you to say nothing of this until I am gone."

"I refuse."

"I have injured no one. I ask you not to spoil my holiday."

"I refuse."

"Then this confession must be made in my own way and I must choose the person who is to set the gossips a-prattling."

"I agree, so long as it is done at once."

"Parker, go down and ask Mr. Sanderstead to come here."

The maid departed, and the alleged Countess leaned back in her chair, closing her eyes again.

"Who are you?" asked his lordship, but the girl made no reply. A moment later Sanderstead came in, his imperturbable face giving no indication of the surprise he felt.

"Will you read to Mr. Sanderstead the extract from your London letter that you read to me?"

"Mr. Sanderstead has nothing to do with my correspondence. You were to make your confession, as I understood your proposal."

"Lord Warlingham has discovered that I am not the Countess of Croydon."

"Oh, is that all," said Sanderstead; "I knew it almost from the beginning."

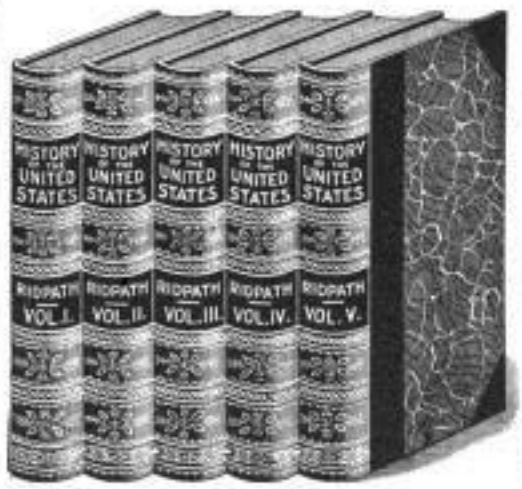
The lady sat up now, very wide awake.

"How did you know it?" she asked in surprise.

"Well, you had none of those middle-class deficiencies of manner which I have often deplored in the titled persons I have met. I recognized at once that you were a lady."

"Then that is what you hinted at twice this evening. I wish to say before you both that I meant no harm and did not see at the first what complications might ensue. I may say at once that I had the Countess' permission to do what I have done; indeed it was owing to her urging that I did it. I can prove that to you, Lord Warlingham, in her own handwriting. I may plead in my own defense that I have devoted my life to the welfare of the Countess, and she would be the first to acknowledge that. It has been a somewhat dreary and retired life. Often I have persuaded her to emerge into the world and as often she has refused, at the last moment, much to my disappointment. On this occasion I confess I wept when I found her determined not to go to Egypt. With great generosity she insisted that I should take her place. I admit that I have done wrong technically, perhaps, but I deny that I have done any real harm, and I have asked Lord Warlingham to say nothing until I sail from Suez a week from to-day."

"Of course nothing will be said either then or after," proclaimed Sanderstead stoutly.



Lord Warlingham stood silent for a moment, then, his anger being somewhat cleared away, he echoed:

"Of course."

The lady sprang to her feet with radiant face.

"You are both very good to me. Lord Warlingham, I ask your forgiveness, and I deeply appreciate your promise of silence. Won't you shake hands with the adventuress and say you are sorry I sail so soon."

"Indeed, madam," said Warlingham cordially taking her hand, "I do say so with all my heart, and I wish you well."

"And are you sorry, Mr. Sanderstead?" she cried with a touch of fear and pathos in the eyes she turned upon him.

"No, I am not."

The lady caught her breath and the color left her cheeks.

"Oh, I say, Sanderstead," protested his lordship.

"Why should I be sorry when I sail on the same steamer, if the lady permits me." He took her hand and raised it to his lips. Lord Warlingham adjusted his eye-glass and beamed upon them with a smile half tender, half comical. He was an experienced man and knew the signs.

"Is this a case of 'Bless you, my children'?" he asked.

"Again, if the lady permits."

The color came back redoubled and brought with it a smile to the lady's lips.

Yet she was the Countess, after all.

THE CALL OF THE WILD

IV—Who Has Won to Mastership

"EH? Wot I say? I spik true w'en I say dat Buck two devils."

This was François' speech next morning when he discovered Spitz missing and Buck covered with wounds. He drew him to the fire and by its light pointed them out.

"Dat Spitz fight lak hell," said Perrault as he surveyed the gaping rips and cuts.

"An' dat Buck fight lak two hells," was François' answer. "An' now we make good time. No more Spitz, no more trouble, sure."

While Perrault packed the camp outfit and loaded the sled, the dog-driver proceeded to harness the dogs. Buck trotted up to the place Spitz would have occupied as leader; but François, not noticing him, brought Sol-leks to the coveted position. In his judgment, Sol-leks was the best lead-dog left. Buck sprang upon Sol-leks in a fury, driving him back and standing in his place.

"Eh? Eh?" François cried, slapping his thighs gleefully. "Look at dat Buck. Heem keel dat Spitz; heem t'ink to take de job."

"Go 'way! Chook!" he cried; but Buck refused to budge.

He took Buck by the scruff of the neck, and though he growled threateningly dragged him to one side and replaced Sol-leks. The old dog did not like it, and showed plainly that he was afraid of Buck. François was obdurate, but when he turned his back Buck again displaced Sol-leks, who was not at all unwilling to go.

François was angry. "Now, by Gar! I feex you!" he cried, coming back with a heavy club in his hand.

Buck remembered the man in the red sweater and retreated slowly; nor did he attempt to charge in when Sol-leks was once more brought forward. But he circled just beyond the range of the club, snarling with bitterness and rage; and while he circled he watched the club so as to dodge it if thrown by François.

The driver went about his work, and he called to Buck when he was ready to put him in his old place in front of Dave. Buck retreated two or three steps. François followed him up, whereupon he again retreated. After some time of this François threw down the club, thinking that Buck feared a thrashing. But Buck was in open revolt. He wanted, not to escape a clubbing, but to have the leadership. It was his by right. He had earned it, and he would not be content with less.

Perrault took a hand. Between them they ran him about for the better part of an hour. They threw clubs at him. He dodged. They cursed him, and his fathers and mothers before him, and all his seed to come after him down to the remotest generation, and every hair on his body and drop of blood in his veins; and he answered curse with snarl and kept out of their reach. He did not try to run away, but retreated around and around the camp, advertising plainly that when his desire was met he would come in and be good.

François sat down and scratched his head. Perrault looked at his watch and swore. Time was flying and they should have been on the trail an hour gone. François scratched his head again. He shook it and grinned sheepishly at the courier, who shrugged his shoulders in sign that they were beaten. Then François went up to where Sol-leks stood and called to Buck. Buck laughed, as dogs laugh, yet kept his distance. François unfastened Sol-leks' traces and put him back in his old place. The team stood harnessed to the sled in an unbroken line, ready for the trail. There was no place for Buck save at the front. Once more François called and once more Buck laughed and kept away.

"T'row down de club," Perrault commanded.

François complied; whereupon Buck trotted in, laughing triumphantly, and swung around into position at the head of the team, his traces were fastened, the sled broken out, and with both men running they dashed out on to the river trail. Highly as the dog-driver had forevalued Buck, with his two devils, he found, while the day was yet young, that he had undervalued. At a bound, Buck took up the duties of leadership; and where judgment was required, and quick thinking and quick acting, he showed himself the superior even of Spitz, of whom François had never seen an equal.

But it was in giving the law and making his mates live up to it that Buck excelled. Dave and Sol-leks did not mind the change in leadership. It was none of their business. Their business was to toil, and toil mightily, in the traces. So long as that was not interfered with they did not care what happened. Billee, the good-natured, could lead for all they cared, so long as he kept order. The rest of the team, however, had grown unruly during the last days of Spitz, and their surprise was great now that Buck proceeded to lick them into shape.

Pike, who pulled at Buck's heels, and who never put an ounce more of his weight against the breastband than what he was compelled, was swiftly and repeatedly shaken for loafing; and ere the first day was done he was pulling more than ever before in his life. The first night in camp, Jo, the sour one, was punished roundly—a thing that Spitz had never succeeded in doing. Buck simply smothered him by virtue of superior weight, and cut him up till he began to whine for mercy.

The general tone of the team picked up immediately. The team recovered its old-time solidarity, and once more the dogs leaped as one dog in the traces. At the Rink Rapids two native huskies, Teek and Koona, were added; and the celerity with which Buck broke them in took away François' breath.

"Nevaire such a dog as dat Buck!" he cried. "Nevaire! Heem worth one t'ousan' dollair. Eh? Wot you say, Perrault?"

And Perrault nodded. He was ahead of the record then, and gaining day by day. The trail was in excellent condition, well-packed and hard, and there was no new-fallen snow with which to contend. It was not too cold. The temperature dropped to fifty below zero and remained there the whole trip. The men rode and ran by turn, and the dogs were kept on the jump.

The Thirty-Mile River was comparatively coated with ice, and they covered in one day going out what had taken them ten days coming in. In one run they made a sixty-mile dash from the foot of Lake Le Barge to the White Horse Rapids. Across Marsh, Tagish and Bennett (seventy miles of lakes) they flew so fast that the man whose turn it was to run towed behind the sled at the end of a rope. And on the last night of the second week they topped White Pass and dropped down the sea-slope with the lights of Skaguay and of the shipping at their feet.

It was a record run. Each day for fourteen days they had averaged forty miles. For three days Perrault and François threw chests up and down the main street of Skaguay and were deluged with invitations to drink, while the team was the constant centre of a worshipful crowd of dog-busters and mushers. Then three or four Western bad men aspired to clean out the town, were riddled like pepper-boxes for their pains, and public interest turned to other idols. Next came official orders. François called Buck to him and cursed him through excess of affection, threw his arms around him, wept over him. And that was the last of François and Perrault. Like other men, they passed out of Buck's life for good.

Another "Rough Rider" Wins Out

WILLIE FUGATE is a twelve-year-old boy living in a town of 200 inhabitants in the Pecos River Valley, New Mexico, on the line of the Santa Fe Railroad. He had a bronco, but had grown tired of riding "bareback" and wanted a saddle. He read of a boy in an Eastern town having made money by selling and wrote for information. His neighbors did not know much about THE POST and he sold only two copies out of the ten received. Most of the trains stop at Willie's town for water and he wandered down to the station "to see the train come in." When he saw a number of passengers step out of the train a thought struck him. Mounting a pile of ties, he announced in a loud voice: "You won't have a chance to get any more reading matter for 250 miles—you'd better get a copy of this week's SATURDAY EVENING POST." In about two minutes he had sold the other eight copies and could have sold a dozen more. That night he wrote for 50 copies for next week and sold every one.

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

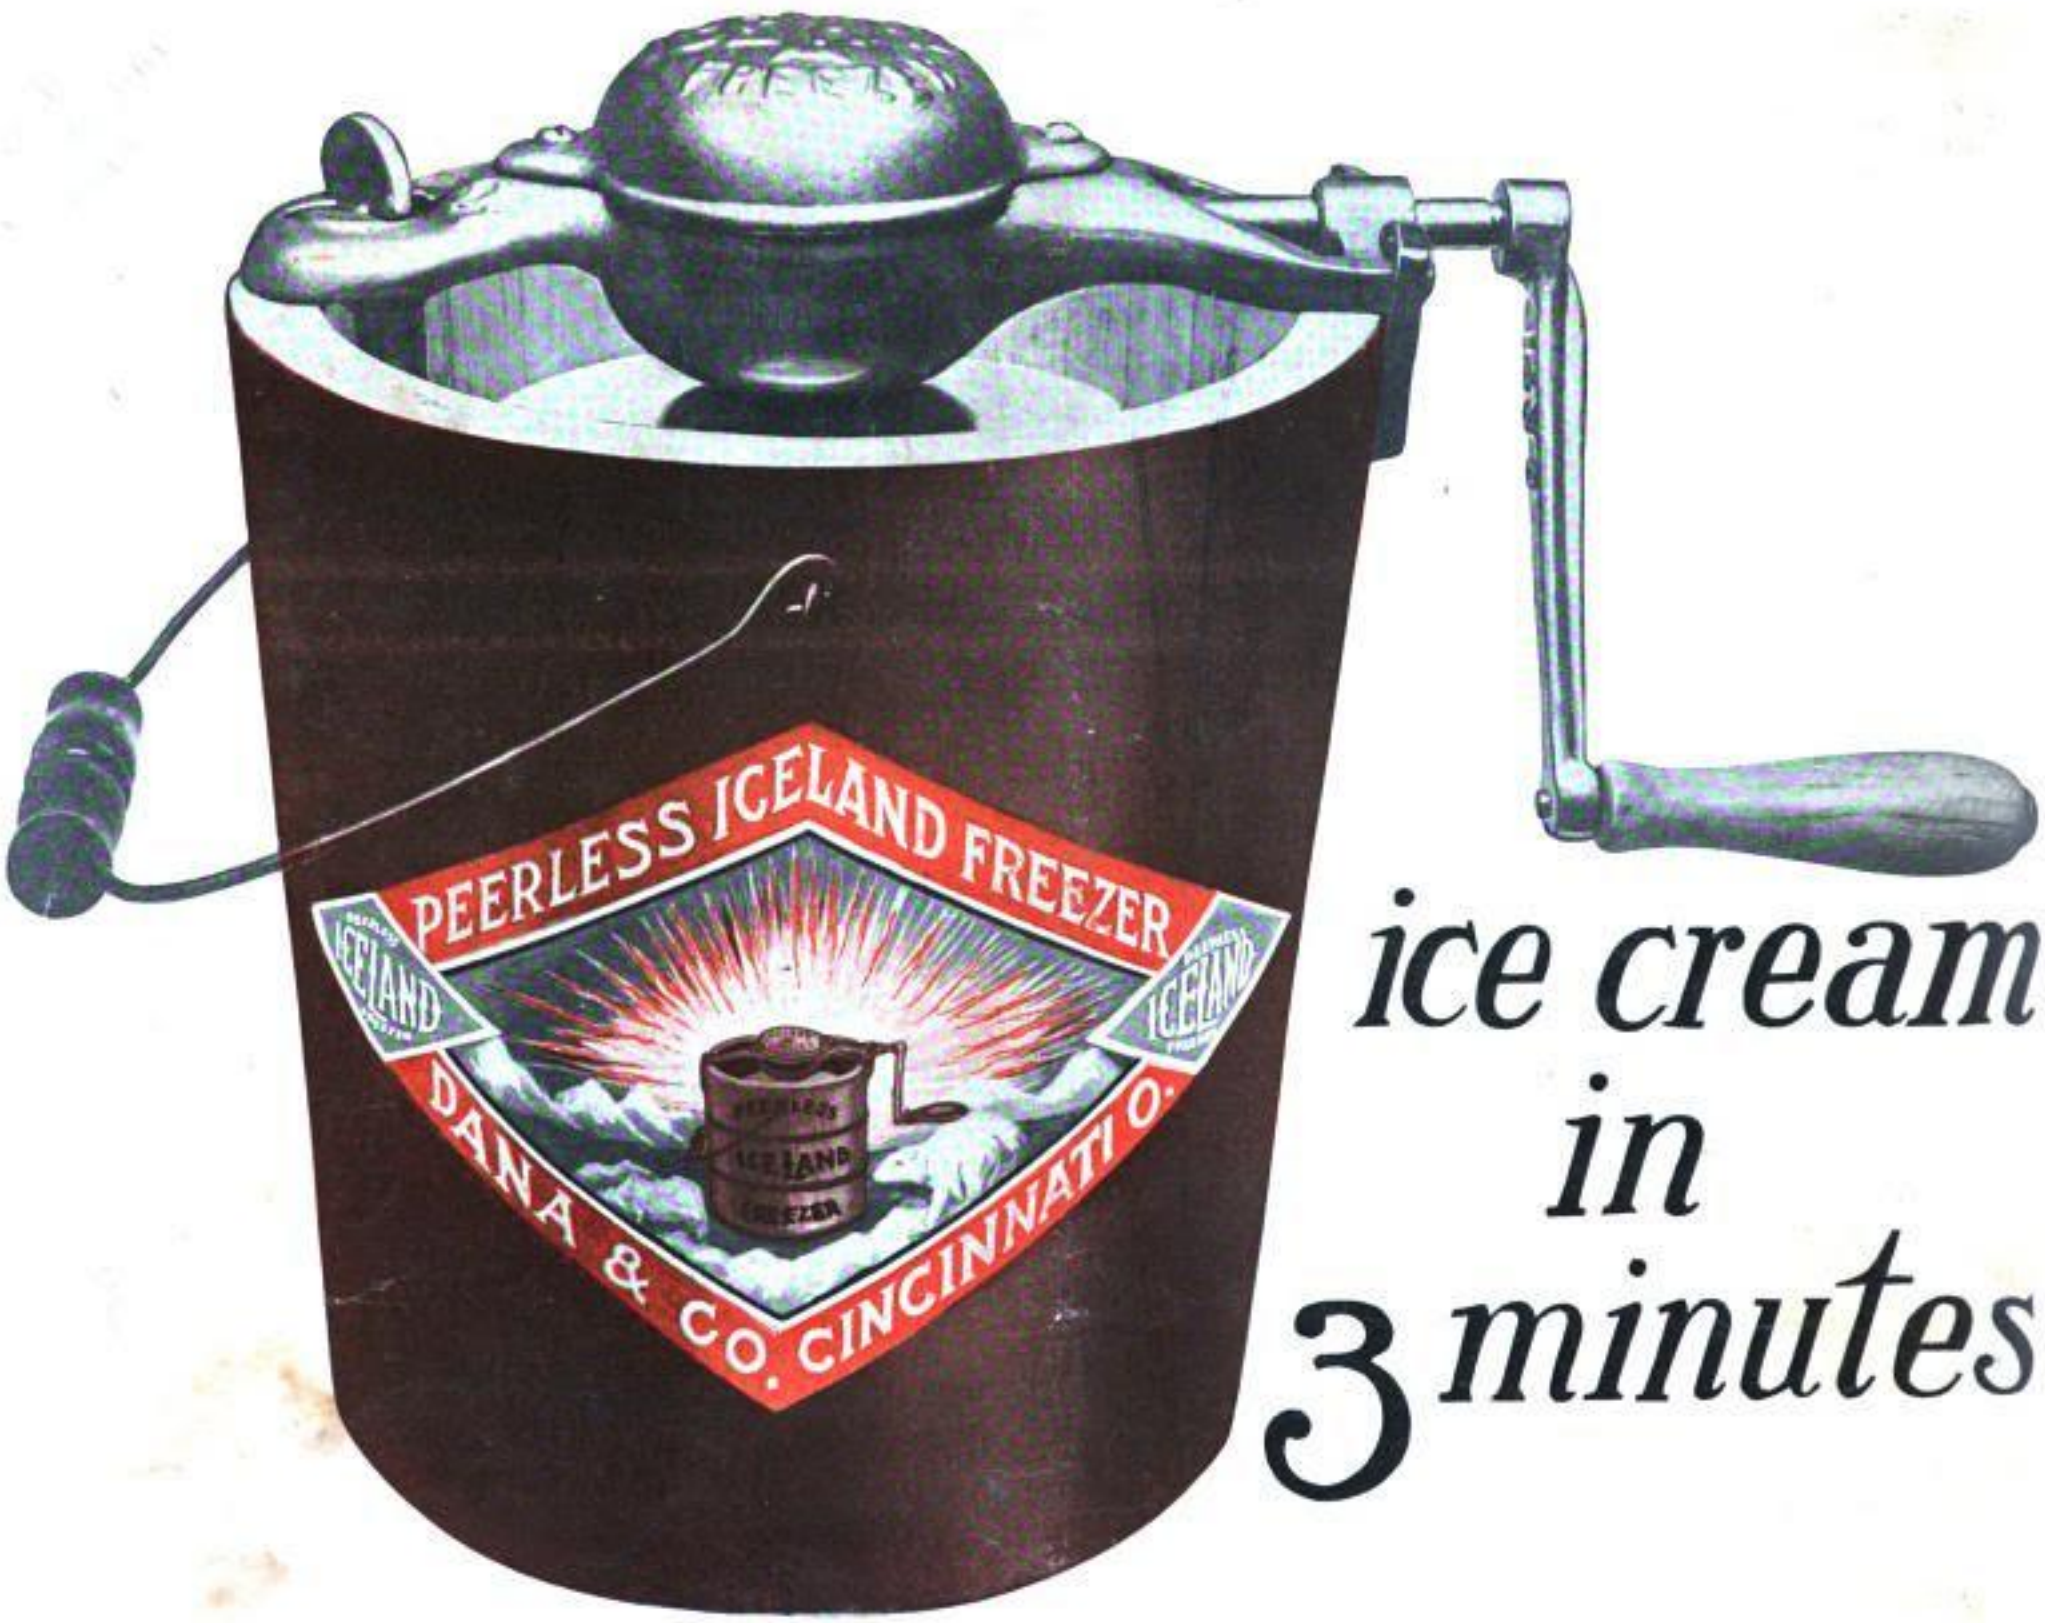
During the next month he sold over 400 copies and bought "not only a dandy saddle but a blanket." Since then he has sold an average of about 125 copies a week and each month won one of the cash prizes offered to the boys who do good work. He writes: "We have more coyotes than people here, but I think I can jump that order to 200 copies a week when the travel gets a little heavier."



Any Boy Out of School During Vacation Can Earn Money

selling THE POST. We send the first week's supply free. This provides capital for the following week. Write for the TEN FREE COPIES to-day. DON'T BE AFRAID TO TRY IT. If 6000 other boys are making money by this plan you can do the same.

NEXT MONTH $250 in Extra Cash Prizes will be Given to Boys Who Do Good Work
